AUSTRALIAN ESSAYS on Subjects Political, Moral, and Religious. By JAMES NORTON, Esq., Son... of Elsewhere, in the county of Cumberland, New South Wales, Member of the Legislative Council of New South Wales.

"A handsome volume."—Spectator.

"The opening papers are appropriate and to the purpose."—Weekly Dispatch.

"Topics important in themselves, and discussed not without ability and candour."—Literary Gazette.

"It is with much pleasure we notice this volume of Essays from the Antipodes. Their appearance is a good sign, and their merit far from inconsiderable. Mr. Norton possesses a fine if not a brilliant intellect, and that supported and directed by considerable discrimination and high moral principle. It is to his credit that, during his thirty-four years of arduous professional duties, he has found time, perhaps made it, to vindicate the higher elements of our nature in the thick, and for the benefit, of the eager, money-hunting community among whom he has lot has been cast. His Essays need no indulgence, though fairly entitled to it, as will be admitted when it is added they make their appearance not under his personal superintendence, but that of a friend. Of the religious essays we think we may safely say that they are brief and pointed, and are characterised by the same independence of thought which pervades the moral and political. The latter are deserving of the serious consideration of all who set store on our counsels, the duties of the colonists on and as against the neglectful mother country, lucidly and temperately stated. One thing we must not omit to notice, his friend has done him justice—the book is tastefully got up, and may, in conclusion, be recommended generally as an elegant and valuable gift-book as well as a noticeable contribution to English literature.—Sun

THE ELECTIONS.

THIS issue placed before the country for trial by the dissolution of Parliament, was simply one of confidence or of no confidence in the Administration of Lord Palmerston. Herein Lord Palmerston proved himself to be a consummate tactician. His opponents, whether represented by Mr. Disraeli, leading a large body of adherents who might be counted by hundreds; by Mr. Gladstone, with a smaller following, to be counted by tens; by Mr. Cobden, representing a still scantier confederacy, to be counted by units; or by Mr. Roebuck, his own army, his own general, his own trumpeter, his own private soldier, and whose following is himself alone—desired to try no such issue. They would, collectively and individually, have been far better pleased if the Minister had resigned office, leaving the late Parliament to form itself into new combinations, and to drag out its existence to the full allotted term of seven years. But Lord Palmerston, aware of the weakness of his adversaries, and believing himself to be the Minister of the nation far more than the Minister of a party, boldly appealed to the people for their "aye" or their "nay" on the question of confidence.

As far as an opinion can be formed of the result of the elections by the addresses of candidates, by the proceedings at public meetings or at nominations, or by the absence of opposition to Ministerial and Liberal candidates in counties, cities, or boroughs where opposition might have been anticipated, the Government is likely to obtain a large majority in the new Parliament. This majority will be mainly due to the public approval of the patriotic energy of Lord Palmerston's foreign policy. From 1815 until 1853 the British people cared little for, and understood less of, Continental affairs; except at short intervals, in 1830 and 1848, when revolutions in Paris convulsed Europe, and threatened to change the general aspect of public affairs in all civilised countries. But from 1853 to the present time foreign politics have been more keenly studied. The more intimately the people understood them, the more they learned to admire the courage—vulgariter, the "pluck"—of Lord Palmerston in maintaining, against all gainsayers and opponents, great or small, the dignity, the honour, and the rights of his country, and her claim to rank first and foremost in the councils of civilisation. The pettiness of a foreign foe was not allowed by the Minister to shield her from punishment. The dispute with Greece, in the famous claim of Don Pacifico, is a case in point. The bold front maintained against the colossal power of Russia as soon as Lord Palmerston was allowed to assume the whole responsibility of the war is a case in point on the other side, to prove that his conduct was dictated, not by the strength or weakness of an enemy, but by the justice of the cause he had to defend, by the inflexibility of his principles, and by the honour of his country. So, again, in the unfortunate misunderstanding with the Cantonese. The foe was scarcely worthy of British steel; but the insult was gross, and the breach of faith unmistakable. It was necessary not only to support British functionaries on the other side of the globe, who had acted for the best on a very trying and difficult occasion, but to chastise the insolence of semi-barbarians who presumed upon long-continued impunity to overstep the limits of decency and propriety, and who misinterpreted British forbearance until they imagined it to be pusillanimity. In all these, and many other circumstances familiar to the public, Lord Palmerston acted as became a high-spirited Englishman, and a prudent and far-seeing statesman. The country admired his energy and approved of his policy, and he became the most popular Minister who has held power in this country since the days of William Pitt. This popularity still attaches to him, and will largely influence the result of the pending elections in every part of the country.

But Lord Palmerston like every other Minister and every other man, has his weak point. Absorbed in foreign politics as he has been all his life, he has not sufficiently studied the domestic wants of his countrymen. He entered into public life when the cry of "Reform" was unfashionable among many, and almost treasonable in the estimation of the ruling classes. He has never learned to understand or to love it. He is not a Reformer after the fashion of Mr.

BANQUET TO HER MAJESTY'S MINISTERS AT THE MANSION HOUSE.—(SEE PAGE 296.)

Cobden, or of the late Daniel O'Connell and Mr. Henry Hunt. He is not even a Reformer after the safer and quieter fashion of Lord John Russell. Of his own free act he will not originate any great reforms. They are not in his line. They are not even to his taste. But, like other men, who, without being Reformers in theory, can become Reformers in practice, he only needs the spur, and the unmistakable expression of the national will, to carry into effect the Reforms for which more advanced minds have prepared the public. The late Sir Robert Peel was not originally a Free-trader; but he gave the country Free-trade. The Duke of Wellington was not a friend of Roman Catholic Emancipation, but he contributed more largely than any other man, except Sir R. Peel and Daniel O'Connell, to the settlement of that troublesome question. In like manner Lord Palmerston may not volunteer measures of Reform—he may not care for the extension of the suffrage—for the abolition of a score or two of the rotten boroughs which the last Reform Bill permitted to remain—and for some other measures of a cognate description; but he will help to pass those measures if the public but demand them with sufficient earnestness and perfinacity. In foreign politics Lord Palmerston is a leader of the people; in domestic politics he is a mere follower. In his speech at the Lord Mayor's dinner on Friday last he confined himself to foreign affairs, and blew a trumpet-blast which is yet sounding through the country. In his address to the electors of Tiverton—though still most emphatic upon foreign affairs, and on the dispute with the Cantonese—he broke ground on the question of Reform, and, in two pithy sentences, epitomised the whole policy—past, present, and future, domestic and foreign—of his Government. Such Reformers as have held aloof from the Administration, and from the candidates who support it, will gather confidence from the somewhat tardy though still seasonable declaration. "Abroad," says the Prime Minister, "it will be our earnest endeavour to procure peace, but peace with honour and with safety; peace with the maintenance of national rights; peace with security to our fellow countrymen in foreign lands. At home our guiding principles will be judicious and well-regulated economy, progressive improvement in all that concerns the welfare of the nation;—the continued diffusion of education among the people, and such well-considered reforms as from time to time may be required by changes of circumstances and by the increasing growth of intelligence." Without such a declaration as this on the part of its chief we believe the Government would have had a majority. With such a declaration—so significant, so precise, and so much to the purpose—we believe the majority will be very considerably increased; and that it will be the fault of the people themselves if in the new Parliament they do not convert his Lordship into a very excellent practical Reformer.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Thursday.

THE Mi-carême has given an excuse, which, however, was very little required, for a variety of fêtes, many of them outdoing those of the Carnival. The public ones were those of the blanchisseuses, who, with a procession, and various triumphal cars and allegorical devices, promenaded the streets on Thursday; on which day also fell the Fête of St. Joseph, the patron of the carpenters, who did honour to their protector by attending a Grand Mass at the Church of St. Laurent, and afterwards parading, with military music, and various trophies of their trade, carried on their heads or shoulders. The sight was curious, and not without interest, having a character quite apart from the generally inane festivities of the ordinary masques of the Carnival time. In the evening took place the magnificent bal costumé of M. Fould, in which the Emperor and Empress took an active part; the former changing his domino several times, but wearing on his breast a magnolia leaf, by which he was distinguished by the crowd, who made way before him. The Empress appeared first in a domino, which she afterwards exchanged for a sort of Moorish or Arab costume, enveloping the whole figure, the head being covered with a veil in which was cut a square hole, covered with a silken network, serving the purpose of a mask. Lady Cowley wore the costume of Mary Tudor; the beautiful Comtesse de Castiglione, a trying and by no means elegant or becoming dress, that of a Balearian peasant—red woollen petticoat, blue apron, and high cap, in the cauchoise style. One of the most original and effective costumes in the ball-room was that of the Marquise de Brigode, as Juno, as conceived by the ballet-master in the time of Louis XIV. Among the male travesties, M. de Nieuwerkerke's was decidedly the one that attracted most attention, being that of a savage, with all the accompaniments of arms, scalps, teeth necklaces, paint, and tattoo. His aspect was truly formidable, not to say repulsive. The splendour of this ball has even outdone that of Mdme. de Walewska.

The stir relative to the affair of M. de Dreux-Brezé increases rather than diminishes in gravity and importance, and this for two reasons—in the first place, the examinations consequent thereon have brought to light the facts that the Bishop of Moulins does not stand alone in the employment of the acts of injustice and abuse of authority of which he is accused; but that many others have resorted to the same, and that they have maintained a sort of silent opposition to the civil administration, by forbidding, by the establishment of synodical rules, the clergy under them from addressing themselves for redress to the lical authorities. In the second, it appears that M. de Dreux-Brezé, not content with exercising arbitrary sway over the inferior clergy, has attempted similar, or even greater, attacks on the liberties of lay men. In one instance a lady, lately dead, had given to the priest of her parish the use of a house belonging to her, and, at her death, charged her son to continue the loan thereof so long as the priest should live, or should require it. M. de Dreux-Brezé sent for the young man and demanded that he should present the house, as a free gift, to the Church, and, on his refusal, publicly in the church, excommunicated him. Pretty well for the nineteenth century.

The chapel of the Convent du Sacre-Cœur, in the Rue de Varennes, is daily the resort of as many ladies as can contrive to get tickets of admission, to hear the sermons preached by the Père de Ravignan, during the retraite des Filles de Marie. The number of applications so enormously exceeds what the size of the chapel admits that comparatively few are able to obtain place.

MM. Mirès and Véron having taken up the pen to defend the cause of the much-aggrieved, much-defamed financiers, M. Millaud now follows in the train. In the article in question M. Millaud takes upon himself to prove that within the last twenty years the wealth of France has increased eight thousand millions of francs. We know not if the gentleman in question succeeds in proving his position to those few who comprehend these matters; we only know that the many who do not become every day more sensible of the naked fact that lodgings, provisions, clothing, everything, increases in price to such a degree that necessaries now stand at the rate of luxuries; that the poor grow daily poorer in consequence; and that the amount of suffering among this class, and of embarrassment in the classes above, has reached a pitch that will render it necessary to adopt some more solid system of relief and appeasement than the demonstrations of M. Millaud on the subject.

A fresh action of defamation is being brought against M. Eugene de Mirecourt, author of "Contemporary Biographies;" this time by M. Mirès, one of those much-victimised millionaires who feels himself aggrieved by certain remarks made by M. de Mirecourt.

A marriage—partly belonging to the financial world, whose head stands so high as to provoke the naughty boys of the world of literature to throw stones at it—has just taken place between the son of M. Pereire and the daughter of M. Fould, cousin, we believe, to the Minister of State.

It is said that Alexandre Dumas proposes to elevate a new phœnix of a journal, entitled "Monté Christo," on the ashes of his "Mousquetaire." "L'Artiste" promises to be continued under the most favourable auspices—Theophile Gautier, assisted by Charles Blanc and Paul de St. Victor, taking in hand its superintendence and the larger portion of the contents. Among other attractive papers will appear in it, twice a month, "La Galerie du XIX^e^ Siècle;" that is to say, notices on all the chief illustrations of French art and literature of the century, accompanied by steel-engraved portraits.

THE CIRCASSIAN EXPEDITION.

Constantinople journals of the 13th inst. say that numerous arrests had taken place in consequence of the affair of the Kangaroo, most of the parties being Austrian or Hungarian in the service of the Porte. They are accused of having organised the expedition sent to the assistance of the Circassians. The commission of inquiry appointed at the application of the Russian Embassy relative to the affair of the Kangaroo is composed of Sefik Pacha, Riza Bey, Tefik Bey, and Faik Bey, and holds its sittings at the Seraskier's hotel.

The following letter from the Pesth Lloyd cannot but be acceptable to all those who take an interest in the fate of the Caucasian races:

Circassian Head-quarters, Tuabs, Feb. 28.

By means of the British steamer Kangaroo you will receive this letter which will, perhaps, convey to Europe the first information of an event that may have very great influence on the future fate of the Circassian nation. It is known to you that Mehemed Bey (Banaya), to whose person I am attached, has acceded to the wishes of the chiefs and deputies of the Circassian tribes, and has accepted the post of Commander-in-Chief. On Monday, the 23rd of February, we landed at Tuabs, where we have our head quarters. Before our departure, Mehemed Bey organised a couple of hundred excellent military instructors for the different arms, and they accompanied us hither. Mehemed Bey has to-day been solemnly proclaimed General-in-Chief of all of the Circassian tribes. Princes, nobles, and deputies of the people have sworn on the Koran to obey him; and a deputation of the Circassian Diet has to-day sent in the flag of the prophet, which is the symbol of the highest power. The enthusiasm was very great when the new commander swore fidelity to the sacred standard. (The flag itself is green, and on it is a white sword with the crescent and the star.)

The excitement is great, and the Circassians are resolved to obtain their complete independence or to perish in the struggle for it. It is expected that 150,000 men will be in the field by the month of May. "Russia," said Mehemed Bey to me just now, "will soon have an opportunity of convincing herself that a new spirit prevails. I know her intrigues which are played at my disposal (Mehemed Bey was with the Circassians during the late war) and am of opinion that a nation which without a military organisation could carry on during thirty years will, when properly organised, be able to achieve its complete independence." You may expect to receive some important news from these mountains in the coming spring.

AMERICA.

The Royal mail steam-ship Niagara arrived at Liverpool on Monday, with Boston mails of the 11th, and Halifax of the 13th.

In the Senate the Republicans grumbled at the formation of the committees, considering that they were not sufficiently represented. The Democrats had nominated the majority of all the important committees. Mr. Crittenden had introduced resolutions in opposition to the new maritime code of the European Powers with reference to privateering, and in favour of the complete exemption of all vessels engaged in commerce and their cargoes from seizure in time of war. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Standing Committee on Foreign Relations was composed of Messrs. Mason, Douglas, Slidell, Pelk, Crittenden, Seward, and Fish.

The Washington correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer states that the British treaty had been referred to the Committee on Public Affairs, and that the determination appeared to be to act upon it. The President is said to have expressed a wish that the Senate would act immediately on the matter. The correspondent of the New York Times is of opinion that this negotiation of the treaty is impossible in its present form.

The Secretary of the Navy has ordered the Unit l States' steam-frigates Niagara and Merrimac to be equipped for sea with all possible despatch, as these vessels have been selected to assist in laying down the Atlantic telegraph cable between Newfoundland and Ireland, in compliance with the Act just passed by Congress.

TORTURE IN SICILY.

His Majesty of the Two Sicilies has recently introduced a new luxury into his prison discipline, in addition to the many already existing. It is called a cap of silence (cuffia di silenzio), and both for the particular purpose for which it is ostensibly applied, and as an instrument of torture generally, it may, perhaps, be considered superior in refinement to the celebrated "iron mask," or any of the engines of antiquity.

INSTRUMENT OF TORTURE OFFERED BY KING FERDINAND TO BE APPLIED TO THE POLITICAL PRISONERS IN ITALY.

The invention is due to the genius of Sig. Bonza, Inspector of Police at Palermo; and it appears to have been highly approved of by the King of Naples that he immediately decorated the philanthropic gentleman with the Order of Francis I.

This cap, or cuffia, consists of a circular band of steel, passing round the head just above the eyes, with a semicircular band of the same material connecting it over the top of the head from ear to ear, attached to this superstructure is a chin-strap of steel wire, growing broader towards the bottom, so as to confine the lower jaw completely, and made to attach impossible to articulate when the bands on the head are properly screwed up; and to complete the adjustment there is a strap of leather with a buckle attached to the chin strap, which passes round the back of the neck, just below the ears, and keeps the latter firm in its place. It is said that the first experiments made with this novel instrument of torture were on two persons called Lo-Re and De Medici, and that the former suffered so much from it that he remained senseless for some time, and a gaoler who saw him, believing the man to be dying, ran and fetched a doctor and a priest without asking Signor Baiona's permission. When the doctor and priest arrived Signor Baiona consented to allow the cap to be removed from the unfortunate prisoner, who was at length restored to life, after a copious bleeding and other remedies; but he ordered a punishment of fifteen blows with a stick to the gaoler, in order to check his over-zealous charity in future.

CURIOSITIES OF THE "CANVASS."

THE glory of the canvass has departed. For the first time since the Act of Settlement we may see a General Election progressing in every Parliamentary borough and county town with no more noise or excitement than if the constituencies were really accomplishing a solemn and serious duty, instead of celebrating what Lord Derby called their saturnalia. There are no flags or favours, no clanging bands or liberally-flowing taps; and, as a natural consequence, a marked absence of cheers and enthusiasm. The aspiring candidates are now reduced to the necessity of blowing their own trumpets, and, though it is a function they are generally well qualified to fulfil, yet both themselves and their audience sadly miss the sonorous brass which was wont to relieve the performance. But the chief deficiency is experienced in what the French would call the "assistants" at the ceremony. Heretofore by far the most numerous and active class of attendants at elections consisted of the non-voters. Having nothing else to do, this section of the population flitted about more restlessly, hurrased more lustily, showed a keener partisanship, broke more windows, and got more drunk than all the electors put together. The attractions which brought together the dilettante assemblage round the hustings or the polling-booth are now extinct. The sad change which the new law has brought about is almost enough to draw poor Colonel Sibthorp out of his grave.

As the characteristics of the election change, so have those of the canvass, that "condition precedent," changed likewise. The old weapons of the canvasser have been snatched from his grasp one after another. Time was—and not so long ago—when the "friend" of a candidate ostentatiously proclaimed his intention of winning by force of gold. He announced that the borough was to be battered with so many thousand pounds, just as if he had been describing the number and calibre of his siege train. In those days iron-bound chests containing some hundredweight of guineas were conveyed in procession to the committee-room, and the world was carefully informed that credit had been opened for "another ten thousand" in the borough bank. There was no art or disguise about the matter. To "canvass" the electors meant simply to bargain with them for the price of their votes. The value of the article varied, of course, according to the demand. In some instances, when voters were few, the contest eager, and result doubtful, the last score or two of electors have fetched £50 a head. This, however, was an extreme case—at any rate, as an affair of direct bargain and sale. At many elections, especially in counties where the distances were great, and the poll remained open for a fortnight, much more than even that amount was paid, first or last, for the votes registered by either candidate. Need we tell, in proof thereof, the story of the "spendthrift election," contested in 1768, in which Lord Spencer, Lord Southampton, and Lord Halifax "ran" their respective candidates against each other; and, though only 1149 votes were polled in all, the total cost was £400,000? The election resulted, of course, in a petition; and, after the competitors had exhausted their devices, or spent all their money, the ultimate issue was decided by an appeal to chance. The three Peers actually tossed for winner, and Lord Spencer, proving the lucky man, seated his nominee. Their Lordships might as well have tossed at first, and saved their money.

When the general public, and subsequently the election committees, became sensible of the fact that "bribery and corruption" were really objectionable, the operation of canvass underwent a change. Some disguise was adopted, and both the candidates and their representatives paid at any rate some hypocritical reverence to electoral purity and virtue. Cats and chickens were then bought by gentlemen addicted to natural history at the rate of £10 and £20 a piece. Canvassers showed themselves so fanatical on the subject of education that they insisted on sending electors' children to school for five years, and paid down on the spot the price of their schooling. One candidate, an amateur of the fine arts, and ardent in loyalty, insisted on decorating the houses of 500 electors with as many prints of the last coronation. It was then a great dodge to get a few hours' start of a rival candidate, so as to preoccupy the local means and appliances of electioneering. An active canvasser has before now made such good use of even sixty minutes as to have engaged every hotel and public-house in the borough, obliging the rival candidate to resort to the "Tom-and-Jerries" for his committee-rooms, and then have monopolised the printers' presses and driven their customers to their wits' end to get placards and circulars struck off. One clever strategist of this sort, in a borough where the voters were widely scattered, hired beforehand every vehicle, down even to the donkey-carts and Bath-chairs, which the law contained for the whole term of the election. His game was, however, out-trumped by the other party, who brought up a triumphant majority to the poll in wheelbarrows, chartered from the works of a railway then constructing in the neighbourhood, and trundled by the navvies.

As the committees became more strict and keen-sighted, the agency system grew into a strong development. The sitting member, in every case of disputed return, was the most innocent and ignorant of mortals. He knew nothing of anything. He could scarcely tell how he came to choose that particular borough. It was the merest accident in the world. He heard casually that the constituency wanted a representative; so he went down as a candidate and came back as a member. If any money was spent at the election he knew nothing about it, and could not help it. So careful was he on his own part, that, during the whole time, he wore a suit of clothes which had no pockets. As for agents, he had no manner of connection with any such cattle. It was singular, perhaps, that a few days before this ingenuous candidate made his appearance in the borough, some one or more mysterious strangers showed their faces there who not only were pockets but had money in them, which money they freely disbursed with the effect of securing votes for the "coming man." When questioned, either then or afterwards, these liberal-minded strangers, of course, knew nothing of the approaching candidate. They had never seen him, and on the whole rather disliked him; but the end was that his cause was successful; and this was all that the public could learn about the matter. Certain bankers might have told some tales, but these were quarters in which it would be indelicate to inquire. As part of the agency apparatus we occasionally come across devices of very mechanical order, such as those which give a name to "Sovereign Alley, or the Lane of Notes," "Hole in the Wall," into which favoured voters were allowed to put their hands, and draw them back with a neat packet of sovereigns deposited by some invisible benefactor.

These devices are now obsolete. The elections, at this moment in full swing, are conducted upon very different principles. We do not say that corruption has ceased, or that bribery has become impossible; but at all events the process has become refined and elevated. This is something. The functions of the canvasser, also, if losing some what of their pristine brilliance and gaiety, will have attained a higher range in the scale of intellect. What was once a trade will now become an art. Deprived of the coarse and sordid machinery of bribation the canvass must proceed upon higher motives of action. The canvasser will then require the abilities and experience of a general to become successful in his profession. As Wellington said, "having fought many battles, I have acquired an instinct about them which I cannot describe; but I know how to fight a battle," so will the skilful artist boast who has fought and won many elections. As for the contests now pending, they will prove, no doubt, not quite as rich in curiosities as their predecessors—and some of them we may, rather collect. In point of number and cost there is no approaching former comings. But of the whole number there are 127 contested elections in England and Wales; 15 in Ireland; and 2 in Scotland. 107 can seats many of them double contests—in all. The aggregate expenditure upon the general election is also computed at over half a million. Computing the number of returned members, it will thus appear that they have each paid, on an average, about £800 for their seats; and, as the whole body of the electorate in Great Britain and Ireland does not exceed 900,000—of whom little more than half are ever brought to the poll—every vote recorded must have cost somebody just one pound sterling.

GENERAL ELECTION.

TIVERTON.—LORD PALMERSTON'S ADDRESS.

Gentlemen,—Parliament having been dissolved in order that the electors of the United Kingdom may have an opportunity of expressing their opinion on the existing state of public affairs, I present myself to you as a candidate for the continuance of that confidence with which, as your representative, I have so long been honoured.

The question which is submitted to the judgment of the country is which shall be the men to whose hands shall be committed the destinies of the nation, and whether that charge shall continue to be confided to the present Administration, or whether it shall be transferred to an aggregation of hitherto discordant elements by whose combined action on a late occasion a vote of censure was passed upon her Majesty's Government.

The claims of the present Administration to the confidence of the country rest upon facts and events which will form an important chapter in the history of these times.

We undertook the conduct of affairs, in obedience to the call of our Sovereign, at a moment of no small difficulty, in the midst of a great war, and when those men who had heretofore been looked up to as the leaders of parties had for various reasons declined the responsibility of office, or had been unable to form such an Administration as was, in their opinion, equal to the crisis. We carried on with energy and vigour the war in which the country was engaged, and, in hearty co-operation with our gallant allies—the French, the Sardinians, and the Turks—we brought it to a successful termination; and the result was a treaty of peace which accorded with the objects of the war, and which secured for the Allies conditions which some of those to whom I have alluded had deemed it unreasonable to propose and impolitic to obtain.

In the execution of the stipulations of this treaty difficulties in regard to matters of great importance arose. Those difficulties, by firmness in negotiation, her Majesty's Government mainly contributed in a satisfactory manner to remove, and the full attainment of the objects of the treaty in regard to the matters in which those difficulties related has thus been secured.

At the beginning of the recent Session of Parliament we announced our intention of taking off the war portion of the income-tax, and we proposed a budget which was approved by a majority of eighty votes.

The Persian war, which had originated in aggressions and breach of engagement by the Persian Government, was put an end to by a treaty of peace concluded at Paris. Our diplomatic relations with the United States had been replaced upon their usual footing by the appointment of Lord Napier and his departure for Washington.

Papers had been presented to Parliament explaining the reasons why the British and French missions had been withdrawn from Naples, and no notice had been given of any motion to be founded on those papers.

Upon none of these matters did the Opposition deem it possible to found any successful attack on the Government.

But events of much importance had happened in China, unforeseen by her Majesty's Government, and not the consequence of any steps taken by them.

An insolent barbarian wielding authority at Canton had violated the British flag, broken the engagements of treaties, offered rewards for the heads of British subjects in that part of China, and planned their destruction by murder, assassination, and poisons.

The British officers, civil and naval, on the station had taken those measures which appeared to them to be proper and necessary to obtain satisfaction and redress, and her Majesty's Government had approved the course pursued by those officers in vindication of the national honour and for the assertion of our national rights. A combination of political parties, not till this last Session united, carried a resolution declaring the course pursued by our officers in China unjustifiable, and consequently censuring her Majesty's Government for having approved that course.

But, if that course was unjustifiable, the British Government, instead of demanding an apology, ought to make one; and, instead of expecting satisfaction, ought to offer compensation to the Chinese Commissioner; and this course the combined opponents of the Government, if their Parliamentary victory had instated them in office, must in consistency have been prepared to pursue.

Will the British nation give their support to men who have thus endeavoured to make the humiliation and degradation of their country the stepping-stone to power?

I confidently assert that such will not be the answer that will be given to the appeal now made to the electors of the United Kingdom.

We offer to the country a Government founded upon far different principles. Abroad it will be our earnest endeavour to preserve peace but peace with honour and with safety, peace with the maintenance of just national rights, peace with security to our fellow-countrymen in foreign lands. At home our guiding principles will be judicious and well-regulated economy, progressive improvement in all things concerns the welfare of the people, the continued diffusion of education among the people, and such well-considered reforms from time to time may be required by changes of circumstances and by the increased growth of intelligence.

On these grounds I present myself to you, and I anticipate with confidence the result of the share which you are about to take in the solemn decision which the constituencies of the United Kingdom are about to pronounce.

I have the honour to be, gentlemen, your obedient and devoted servant,

PALMERSTON.

BOSTON MEETING OF MR. INGRAM'S SUPPORTERS.

From the Boston Guardian.

On Saturday evening a meeting of the friends of Mr. Ingram was held at the London Tavern. The large room of that inn was crowded to excess; though another room was added, yet even then so great was the number of electors who desired to assemble, and to do honour to our worthy and esteemed member, that many hundreds were unable to obtain admittance. His reception was most enthusiastic. When he appeared cheer after cheer arose, proving that the popularity which he had obtained at the last election, and which carried him into Parliament in so triumphant a manner, remained unabated

Mr. Caister, in introducing Mr. Ingram to the meeting, said, we have differences of opinion as to other candidates might divide the town, of one thing he was certain, that but one sentiment pervaded all who were present, and that sentiment was respect to Mr. Ingram. He felt certain that that opinion would shortly be endorsed by themselves when they saw his name triumphantly placed at the head of the poll.

Mr. Ingram (who in rising was received with "three times three." Hearty cheers) said: Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen, You are once together this evening to hear the result of the canvass, but before entering upon that subject I might say that I am no longer your member, for I have received a telegraphic message announcing that Parliament was dissolved this afternoon. The trust which in March last you placed in my hands I therefore now resign to you, I hope as pure and unsullied as when I received it from you (Loud cheers). With respect to my canvass I may say without uttering an untruth, it has been the most successful [illegible] in Boston. I have received the almost unanimous support of those electors whom I have seen (Cheers). My worthy friend, the chairman says he does not like canvassing. I entirely wholly agree with him, for canvassing has some few faults and many advantages. In canvassing, a member goes among people; he sees them at their daily labour in their workshops, at the loom, at the anvil, and at the bench. He sees how they live, and learns how [illegible] (Cheers). [illegible] the respect thereof [illegible] also induces many [illegible] in the metropolis [illegible] of electors in a borough [illegible] of the borough [illegible] meeting me one of your representatives, [illegible] I shall again occupy that proud position (Loud cheers). You will expect, no doubt, that I should say something in regard to the proposed tax. So far as I am in favour of a reduction in the taxation; but the only way to obtain this is by a reduction in the national expenditure. He says that precarious incomes ought not to be taxed so highly as fixed incomes. We all agree that in theory this is correct, but the difficulty is how to carry it out in practice. The most eminent statesmen of the day have attempted to solve this problem and failed. Committees of the House have sat, but their labours have come to nought. There are plenty of men who are ready to take up the office of fault-finders, but it is rather more difficult to point out a remedy. Fault-finders should be fair members (Laughter and cheers). Mr. Adams, however, not only finds fault with the Income-tax; but also the Ten-tax, the Sugar-tax, and almost all the great sources of revenue. Now, we must have taxes, that is very clear, to pay the interest of our enormous national debt, and support our national expenditure; and any man who comes before you and advocates the abolition of all taxes must be—I will not say he is, though some might say he—either a rogue or a fool (Laughter and cheers). The only way, I say again, to reduce taxation is to reduce our enormous national expenditure—to take care that less of the public money is wasted (" Hear, hear," and cheers). All classes are clamouring for a decreased expenditure, and yet we find all sorts of public bodies drawing money out of the Consolidated Fund. Only last Session the landlords were desirous of extra watchers for their preserves, and the County Police Bill was passed; and, of course, they must have one fourth of the expense drawn out of the Consolidated Fund (Shame). I voted against that measure, but the landlord interest was paramount, and the County Police Bill became the law of the land (Shame). The tendency to draw money from this fund is positively increasing, and must be carefully watched and checked, or this Consolidated Fund will become a still more serious item in our national expenditure. I may say that the purpose of some gentlemen to obtain a little fleeting popularity by starting propositions which never can be carried into effect, but no real statesman could countenance such propositions ("Hear," and cheers). With regard to the other gentleman who has issued an address, he says:

"I beg to offer you my distinct assurance that if my appearance as a candidate should be found to prejudice, in any manner, the position of your excellent representative, Mr. Herbert Ingram, I shall be ever prepared to withdraw, as I hold his return to be deservedly entitled to your first consideration."

This is very kind on his part I, at least, certainly cannot object to it (Laughter and cheers). But, with reference to a colleague, I must leave the choice to you. From the first I have thought, and do think, it imprudent to recommend anybody. You made an excellent choice, I think, at the last election (Laughter and cheers), and therefore may fairly leave the election to you again, and I will say no more to you on this point (Renewed laughter and cheers). It has been stated that I am a supporter of Lord Palmerston, and Lord Palmerston only. This I distinctly deny; and I wish you particularly to note what I say. If Lord Palmerston does not agree to widen the basis of the representation, and to alter the monstrous inequities so prevalent in our laws, and reduce the pressure of taxation by judicious economy, I do not intend implicitly to follow him (Cheers). I considered it my duty to support him during the late crisis, and I follow you and the majority of the country agree with me [illegible] I firmly believe that unless he shows a good domestic policy he will be kept in the shade, for in the next Parliament there will be [illegible] a large party of Liberal members determined to carry out many important improvements (Hear, hear). I believe, however, he will yield to the wishes of the people; for, at a dinner at the Mansion-house the other day, he said

"Our creed is, peace abroad and progressive improvement at home (Loud cheers). But the peace which we want is peace with honour peace with safety, peace with the maintenance of national rights—peace with security to our fellow-countrymen abroad

I agree with this; and I feel assured that Lord Palmerston will move with the progressive spirit of the age, and that the next Parliament will see many large and important measures brought forward and carried out (Cheers). With regard to myself, you may rest assured that, so long as you honour me by electing me as your representative, the best place it is in the power of the Government to offer would not, in my opinion, confer on me so great an honour. This is my native town; and my greatest pride is to see it prospering and progressing (Cheers). The improvements in Government are very important; but the improvements in local affairs are to the constituency equally important. In going round the town I am happy to observe that it is rapidly improving. There appears to be an increased amount of comfort among the people. I believe it has commenced a new era, and that before long it will become a large and prosperous place (Hear). I do not wish to [illegible] my popularity for myself in mentioning my belief that the introduction of pure water will be [illegible] of permanent benefit to your town (Cheers). It induces many people to settle here. I envy those who can retire in peace and quietness in so pleasant a town and amongst so intelligent a people (Hear). May this be my lot (Cheers). I was born here, and I hope that, when the time arrives that I can no longer be of service to you in the Legislature, my last (as my earliest happiest days were) may be spent amongst you (Loud and reiterated cheering); for be assured the honour you have done me in electing me as your representative is engraven deep on my heart, and will ever be held in grateful remembrance by me (Loud and reiterated cheers).

The meeting was afterwards addressed by Mr. S. G. Pope, Mr. Tuxford, Mr. Jonathan Duncan, and Mr. Nobl.

BIRMINGHAM At a town's meeting, held at Birmingham on Wednesday evening—the Mayor in the chair—it was resolved "That this meeting disapproves of the attempts being made to make the general election turn on a question of personal adherence to Lord Palmerston; but is of opinion that the principles of civil and religious liberty and progressive reform are those on which the election should be based." A vote of confidence in Messrs Muntz and Scholefield was also passed.

YARMOUTH.—The polling takes place this day (Saturday). The candidates are Sir Edmund Lacon and Colonel Vereker on the Tory, and Mr. M'Culloch and Mr. Watkin on the Liberal, interest. There will be a very severe contest. Sir Edmund Lacon is a brewer and banker, and owns a great number of beer-houses, the tenants of which are expected to vote with the tenure or quit it. The borough is at present under Tory domination, and the Liberal candidates and their friends, who compose a large part of the respectability and worth of the town, have determined to liberate it. Messrs. M'Culloch and Watkin have addressed large audiences of electors in the Corn hall, and on Monday, Wednesday, and Thursday evenings addressed immense gatherings of the inhabitants of the least ten thousand persons having been present. At all these meetings resolutions of confidence and support were unanimously passed. The Liberal candidates are extremely popular, and no such excitement has existed in the borough since Anson and Rumbold freed it from Toryism in the person of the father of the present Sir Edmund Lacon, thirty years ago—[Amidst the numberless contests now in existence there is one which will be decided to-day to which we draw attention, as possessing features of great interest—it is that of Yarmouth. Here two gentlemen, well known in the useful and practical walks of life, and in literature, are endeavouring to wrest the political possession of the borough from Tory domination. Mr M'Culloch and Mr. Watkin will have a hard contest, but to disbelieve in the success of their cause would be to despair of right principles themselves. They have to contend with intimidation and with beer, violence and corruption, demoralisation of the poorer voter, who, if incorruptible, is exposed to the "public-house" wrong and the proud man's contumely." We heartily wish them success for the sake of the cause, and also for the reason of the candidates' own merits.]

NOMINATIONS

THURSDAY.

BEDFORD.—The respective candidates—viz., Mr. S. Whitbread, Captain Stuart, Mr. T. Barnard, and Mr E. T. Smith—having been proposed. The returning officer called for a show of hands, and the decision not being considered conclusive a poll was demanded.

BATH.—There were no less than five candidates—namely, Mr. Tite (one of the late sitting members, Sir A. H. Elton, Mr. Whateley, Mr. Hunt, and Mr. Wise. A poll was demanded

CHESTER.—The show of hands was in favour of Sir J. Graham and Mr. Ferguson. A poll was demanded

CHICHESTER.—The show of hands was in favour of the Right Hon. E. Ellice and Mr. Joseph Paxton. A poll was demanded.

HERTFORD.—The show of hands was in favour of the late sitting members Mr Chambers and the Hon. Mr. Cowper. A poll was demanded by Sir M. Farquhar NOTTINGHAM. Mr. Walter, Mr. Paget, and Mr. Ernest Jones were the candidates. A poll was demanded.

WESTMINSTER. The nomination for Westminster took place on Thursday morning, on hustings erected in Covent-garden. It was of a very different character from the Westminster nominations of the olden time, when Sir Francis Burdett and Sir John Cam Hobhouse were the great political favourites and there were no people on or before the hustings who displayed any great zeal on behalf of either of the candidates. It was in contrast some time previous to the nomination that Mr. Westhead had retired, and that Sir De Lacy Evans and Sir John Shelley would be returned unopposed. The candidates having made their appearance, the oath was administered to the High Bailiff (Mr. F. Smedley), by Mr. Hall the chief magistrate of the metropolitan district. Dr. Baisbridge nominated Sir De Lacy Evans, and Mr. H. G. Robinson seconded the nomination, and expressed a hope that Sir De Lacy Evans would not be tested in reference to the China question, but upon his general character. Mr. Ridgood nominated Sir J. V. Shelley, and Mr. J. George, who is well known as a shoemaker of St. Ann's, seconded the nomination. The two candidates having addressed the meeting, the High Bailiff put the question as to the return of Sir De Lacy Evans and Sir John Shelley to the meeting, and they were declared duly elected.

WINDSOR.—The return of Messrs. Grenfell and Ricardo was considered certain.

BOSTON ELECTION.

(By Electric Telegraph.)

Friday, March 27, 2 p.m.

Ingram and Adams returned: Burke retired.

ADVERTISING FOR CANDIDATES.—The following curious advertisement appears in the Berwick Advertiser of Saturday:—"Wanted, a candidate for the representation of the county of Berwick in the Commons' House of Parliament, the present hon. member not having, as yet, signified his intention of again coming forward. Parties of moderately Liberal principles, and having the other requisite qualifications, are entreated to make immediate application."

COUNTRY NEWS.

LUNDHILL COLLIERY EXPLOSION.—Contrary to expectation, the drawing off of the water, preliminary to reaching the bodies of the victims of the late explosion, did not commence until late on Tuesday afternoon. On Monday the water had reached within fifteen inches of the height fixed by the engineers as that required to overpower the burning matter. Great disappointment was felt by many of the relatives of the deceased, who, despite the unfavourable state of the weather, had come from a distance to be present at the commencement of operations which would lead to the speedy recovery of some of the bodies. This anxiety was greatly increased by it having been made known that some of the men who had descended to the water in the pit had observed some bodies floating on the surface. This, however, on more minute inspection, was found not to be the case. At an early hour on Tuesday morning the water had reached the maximum height of sixty feet, and during the forenoon it was stopped from running into the pit. It was then expected that, as everything had been ready for some days past for drawing off the water, operations would be at once commenced. This, however, was not the case, as it was nearly four o'clock before the iron buckets could be said to have commenced drawing. The delay was occasioned, in a great measure, by it being found, at the eleventh hour, that the buckets were too large, and that other essentials, although trifling matters, had been overlooked. Loud were the complaints of the poor women, who came towards the pit, on hearing of the apparent dilatoriness of the parties. Their grief, however, had no effect upon the police stationed at the pit, who rudely sent them away from the ground under which their husbands, fathers, and brothers lie. Two powerful fans, for exhausting the gases in the upcast shaft, have been erected, to be worked by steam-power. As soon as the water has been drawn off, the fans will be brought into operation, so as to allow parties going to the bottom to do so without the risk of another explosion, as the vast body of gas accumulated in the pit would render such a thing probable, if not carried off. The men on whom will devolve the onerous task of searching for the bodies will be selected from the various pits in the district, and will embrace the best and most experienced miners to be found in the Yorkshire coal-fields.

SEVENTEEN HOUSES BURNED DOWN.—LOSS OF LIFE.—A fire broke out late on the night of the 20th inst. at Alverstoke, about two miles from Gosport, by which seventeen houses were burned to the ground. One woman was burned to death, and her life is supposed to have come furniture, by the roof falling upon her. The fire was ultimately extinguished by the soldiers of the garrison.

A BRIEF JUSTICE "BRAWLING" IN THE CHURCH.—The two learned Judges now presiding in the courts at Warwick Assizes attended at St. Mary's Church of the ancient town on Sunday morning last. The Rev. Albert Boudier, the assistant minister, read the service, and in the course thereof commenced to read the prayer usually offered during the sitting of Parliament, doubtless unaware that Parliament had been dissolved the previous evening. Lord Campbell, who was cognisant of the fact of the dissolution, created some excitement by exclaiming, "No, no, there is no Parliament!" upon which the reverend gentleman desisted from putting up an useless supplication.

THE THOUSANDTH LOCOMOTIVE.—The eminent firm of R. and W. Hawthorn, whose celebrity keeps pace with the progress of the locomotive, are now building their thousandth engine. Some conception may be formed of the progress of railways from this one circumstance—that within about thirty years from the opening of the first passenger line, one single establishment has turned out 1000 locomotive engines—while Stephenson and Co., another Newcastle firm, have turned out even more. Gateshead Observer.

THE EARLDOM OF SHREWSBURY.—This peerage claim promises to be the most memorable cause célèbre of modern times. The genealogical difficulties have been, we understand, very great, and the pedigree researches almost unprecedented in extent. It is, however, confidently expected that Major Wm. Talbot, of Castle Talbot, county Wexford, will be in a position by the time the new Parliament assembles to establish his right as heir male to the brilliant coronet and extensive estates of the premier Earldom of England. Saunders's News Letter

The Spanish Government, wishing to facilitate the return of such refugees as may wish to go back to their country, has decided that pecuniary assistance will be given to those whose resources are insufficient to pay the expense of their journey.

The seventeen equipages of the Black Sea fleet that took part in the dejeuner of Napoleon III. were presented from the Emperor of the French fair with the Cross of St. George, and the inscription, "For the defence of Sebastopol."

The Patrie announces that the steam-cutter Averne is about to sail from Toulon for the mouths of the Danube, where she is to be stationed according to the stipulations of the Treaty of Paris.

M. Colignon, the French engineer, has been appointed to construct the Russian railways, and he is preparing to leave Paris for St. Petersburg. M. Borski, of the house of Fould, has arrived in Paris to arrange for the opening of the subscription lists for the Russian railway shares.

Charles Henry Alderson, Esq., M.A., barrister-at-law, late scholar of Trinity College, Oxford, and the Rev. Reynell Mercel, esq., are gazetted as her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools; and the Rev Benjamin James Binns, B.A., late principal of the Carnarvon Training College, as one of her Majesty's Assistant Inspectors of Schools.

Some subterranean grottoes have been discovered at Darcey (Cote d'Or), at a short distance from the Lyons Railway. They are about 300 metres long and 30 metres high, and terminate at a lake. They contain some fine stalactites and stalagmitic formations.

Madame Bosio, M. Lablache, and other artistes of the Opera at St. Petersburg, have arrived in Paris, the season having terminated.

CULTIVATION OF COCOA AND COFFEE.

THE cultivation of cocoa and coffee ranks next in importance to that of sugar as the great commercial produce of the West Indies, and is every year increasing in importance, through circumstances which have materially changed the condition of our West Indian possessions. The scarcity of labour is the great outcry raised by the planters, resulting from the emancipation, which, to those of the old school, is looked upon as the bane and ruin of their properties.

But, while estates have fallen into decay, have been abandoned and left desolate, where once they flourished in all the pride of tropical luxuriance, the owners might have taken a hint from the steady progress of the labourers of their fields, who, from small beginnings, and cruel years of slavery, have been daily making themselves more and more masters of the soil.

The cultivation of sugar has been, and necessarily will be, the great consideration of West India property; but it is evident that this all-absorbing subject has, in many instances, ruined the speculator in pursuit of it, when, if his attention had been directed to the cultivation of those articles for which the negro population find a ready market, many an estate would have still flourished, or, at least, have been saved from total abandonment.

Most of the West India islands are mountainous; and, as sugar can only be cultivated to advantage on level land, or such as is not on a very steep incline, those portions of estates which comprise high and precipitous land were usually left uncared-for and uncleared, luxuriating in dense forest, and known only to the casual explorer or the negro squatter. But in such localities the negro labourer sought his future fortune. He cleared a spot on the forest-trees, erected upon his humble hut or wigwam, planted his tanias, sweet potatoes, pigeon-peas, and plantains; and, while still quietly labouring for the estate upon which he in all probability had been a slave, seized every moment of relaxation from that labour to repair to his little mountain home, and increase its utility and worth. This led him to clear more ground, and in a year or two he saw himself in possession of a promising crop of cocoa and coffee—in proof of which the writer, who has especially visited the mountain districts of several islands, has never met with a negro hut without this valuable and necessary addition. And here it may be observed, that, while the planters, with their indolence and apathy which so often characterise the Europeans in the tropics, from that labour ceases to clear (undisturbed) as much land as they chose in the mountains, no sooner did they discover the advantages these poor people had gained than every tyrannical method was adopted to deprive them of that which their industry had brought them. The shipmasters, many magistrates in the West Indies know well the numerous applications made to them for ejectments in such cases, and which, unfortunately, they have been obliged to grant, because the colonial laws have been made by those who held as lower once the soil.

In illustration of the character of Cocoa Cultivation we give the accompanying View, which represents a very flourishing estate in the Island of Grenada. It is situated on the side of a lofty mountain, in the parish of St. John, in the Gouyave district; and is the property of a gentleman, who, while holding (as the writer still believes) a high position at the Bar, has distinguished himself for his agricultural knowledge, and the exertions he has made to establish a proper system of policy between the employer and employed, whereby mutual confidence might be established and the interests of both parties equally considered. On this estate the land was divided into regular allotments, for which the labourer paid a moderate rent; or in lieu of that gave a certain amount of labour. He was furnished with young plants of cocoa and coffee, and allowed to cultivate between them such other ground provisions as would be useful to himself, provided they did not interfere with the growth of the more important crop. He was bound to keep the ground and young trees in good order under pain of ejectment, and, when the crop of cocoa or coffee came to maturity, he was allowed the privilege of preparing it and drying it in the extensive mills and premises fitted up by the proprietors. The cocoa and coffee so prepared were shipped to England, and the labourer received his equal share of the profits arising from the sale; or, if objecting to that, he was paid a proportionate value for the quantity which in the first instance he brought to the mill, deducting rent and expenses of preparation.

The writer experienced the greatest pleasure in visiting this estate, on many occasions, as, independent of its beautiful scenery, and the kind and generous hospitality of its owner, there evidently existed such a feeling of happiness and comfort among all his labourers as at once proved how much they were indebted to his exertions and liberality. The usual method of growing cocoa and coffee is well shown in the Engraving, where the portion of the estate appropriated to its cultivation is marked by lines of dark trees, which divide it into different portions, and which show it to occupy a large tract on the slope of the mountain—the upper portion of which, to its very summit, is clothed with dense forest. A broad road, having a row of orange-trees on each side, runs through the entire length of the plantation, and from this at right angles diverge paths to the various allotments. The rows of trees which divide the estate, as shown in the Engraving, are planted for the purpose of affording shelter from the wind, which is very injurious to the young cocoa. They are magnificent evergreens, whose dark glossy leaves, somewhat like the box or myrtle, contrast beautifully with their whitish-grey bark, and the luxuriant golden foliage of the cocoa-trees. The cocoa is usually planted in rows with a coffee-plant between them, allowing sufficient space for a free circulation of air and light, and, generally, in three years' time, yield their first fair crop.

Our next Illustration represents the Bocan or building used for the drying and preparing the coffee and cocoa prior to their shipment. It is usually erected in the most airy situation, and has a platform or terrace extending its whole length on that side most exposed to the sun. The building is generally constructed with two floors—the upper one being used for coffee; the lower one for cocoa. They are divided by partitions of open lathwork, which is also used in a great portion of the ends and sides of the main building, to allow of a free current of air through every part.

The apartment used for drying the cocoa is provided with immense shallow trays, raised a few inches from the floor, on metal wheels. These are made to pass through apertures constructed in the main wall, so as to be rolled out on to the platform; and, in case of rain, to be instantly returned to the store-room. The pips of the cocoa, having been cleared of all extraneous substances by its progress through the mill (of which we gave a description and Illustration in Number 774 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS), are carefully spread out upon these trays, and exposed daily to the sun until thoroughly dried, when, having been sorted and picked, they are packed in bags for shipment.

FLEET OF CHINESE PIRATES PREPARING TO ATTACK.

CHINESE INFERNAL MACHINES.

(From a Correspondent.)

I BEG to send you the plan of a Chinese Infernal Machine, described by a Lieutenant of H.M.S. Niger, in a letter to his father. It differs somewhat from those you have already engraved. The following is the writer's description:—"Several attempts have been made to blow the Encounter up by rafts with barrels of powder, but all unsuccessful, as we have intercepted them floating down with the tide. Most of them had about half a ton of powder in them, and the infernal machines, as I may call them, were of the most ingenious contrivance. Two rafts, with the powder in a large barrel under each, were fastened together with a rope about forty feet long, and the rope was buoyed up by bamboos, as shown in the accompanying Sketch. You will see that if they come across a ship's bows the rope catches, and one raft goes on each side and, by means of some detonating process, bursts directly it comes in contact with the side of the ship." Such machines are becoming an important auxiliary in modern warfare.

CHINESE INFERNAL MACHINE.

CHINESE PIRATE CRAFT.

ONE of the greatest evils the merchants' commerce of the China Seas has to contend with is the immense number of pirate craft which infest the channels of the numerous islands of that country; scarcely a bay or inlet affording a chance of cover or escape from an attacking force but swarms with hordes of these miscreants; and the substantial character and appointments of their vessels, their great speed under sail or propelled by sweeps, light draught of water, and the quantity of combustible annoyances with which they are always provided, make them the most dangerous adversaries which the cruisers for the protection of the traders can fall in with. These vessels almost invariably attack in company: instances are very rare of one of them venturing alone into open water. The lorcha is the class of vessel generally used for their purposes, and some of these are of great size, and mount several guns—pieces of cannon as heavy as 68-pounders having been found on them when captured. A most formidable instrument of annoyance among them is the stink-pot, a vessel containing a highly-combustible and suffocating composition, which is generally thrown from the masthead of the pirate into the attacking vessel; and they have, also, a clever knack of hampering their opponents' movements, by throwing mats over them. When surprised or overtaken they fight with the greatest desperation; and in some of the captured vessels large amounts of specie have been found.

SHANGHAI.

SHANGHAI is one of the most important places of Chinese trade now open to Europe, and is situated up the Woosung River, which empties itself into the Yung-tse-Keang, near the city of Woo-Sung. The entrance is strongly protected by a long line of batteries on the right, also a heavy round tower, or fort, mounting heavy metal; whilst the left bank is defended by a strong battery and castle. The country inside the batteries is highly cultivated, being laid out in paddy or rice fields, with numerous well-cultivated farms and gardens yielding all kinds of fruit and vegetables. The trade between this port and Nunkin is immense, the junks loaded with grain, sugar, &c., entering the Grand Canal at the city of Ching-Keang-Foo, which runs the whole way to Nunkin, and there pay a heavy duty. Few persons can form an idea of the beauty of this river, the extent and depth of which were unknown until our forces and squadron moved up in the year 1842, attacking and capturing the batteries at the above places, and finally anchoring before Nunkin in 22 fathoms of water, where our troops were disembarked and posted round the city until the treaty of peace was signed, and the expenses of the war paid or guaranteed.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 28, 1857.

THE calm and sensible inaugural speech of the newly-elected President of the United States, Mr. Buchanan, will make all but his merely personal and party opponents willingly forget his antecedents. His presence at the Ostend Conference; his conduct as Ambassador in England, when he was accused of exciting animosity instead of promoting amity; his lofty tone ambition to attain the highest place in the States, which had made him grovel to the most vulgar temporary passions and opinions of his countrymen; and his final accession to the Presidency as the chosen of the slave-holding section of the Union, in opposition to Colonel Fremont, led the public to look on him as a mere party leader for personal objects, and to hope nothing from him beyond measures to secure himself in office and increase the power of his supporters. His advanced age, however, and the gratification of his one great desire, have either changed the man or our former judgment of him was erroneous. After invoking the aid of the Almighty to enable him to perform his responsible duties with wisdom and firmness, in such a manner as to redeem the act from the taint of formalism, he gracefully renounced all claims to be a candidate for re-election, and so at once stifled many intrigues and many motives to corruption, such as have influenced the conduct of some of his predecessors, and left himself free to use his power unbiassed by personal objects for the good of his country. In his subsequent declaration, that calmness had succeeded to all the violent passions of a Presidential contest immediately he was elected, there may be some egotism, which we readily pardon for his eulogium on self-government, and a deduction that it was submission to a declared public will constitutionally ascertained which extinguished the strife. As the President of the party averse to agitating the question of slavery, he could not be expected to favour the views of the Freesoilers; but he declares that it is the indispensable duty of the Government to secure to every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his vote. Properly carried out, this principle will give the dwellers in Kansas a fair opportunity to determine the character of their own institutions. Contrary, also, to the narrow view of the Know-Nothings, or Young Americans, who would deny to immigrants the privileges of citizenship, the President declares they have done much to promote the prosperity of the country; and in promising to ensure them "a perfect equality with native-born citizens" he will effectually promote the predominancy of the non slave-holding classes, and promote an accession of Free States to the great federal community. Nor can we speak with censure of the assertion, even if it be not strictly true, that the States have been always moderate and just "in acquiring territory;" for at least it implies that such ought to have been their conduct. His language encourages and ratifies the virtue his predecessors may not have practised. His foreign policy, like that of Washington, is to avoid entangling alliances; to do justice in a kindly spirit to all nations, and require justice from them. Throughout the address there is much to strengthen our hopes that Mr. Buchanan will administer the Government fairly, and increase the amity which prevails between the States and England. To the great principle of the practical measure tending to promote Free-trade, which was the last act, and perhaps the best, of Mr. Pierce's Administration, he gives his approbation. He is for modifying the tariff, and may probably go further than his predecessor, while he injures as little as possible native manufactures. The object of the lately-passed law is to put an end to restrictions on the importation of raw materials, and of such chemical and other articles as are necessary for manufactures; and to lower the duties on almost all the articles hitherto subject to Customs duties. Like Sir Robert Peel's reforms, it increases very much the number of articles which are admitted duty free, and lowers nearly all the duties still levied. It is beneficial to trade at the expense of the revenue of the United States. In fact, the sum collected there till now by Customs duties is considerably in excess of the expenditure of the Federal Government; and, as it accumulates in the public treasury—abstracting coin from circulation—it embarrasses trade, and encourages waste and corruption. Mr. Buchanan praises the measure, and declares "that no more revenue ought to be collected from the people than the amount necessary to defray the expenses of a wise, economical, and efficient administration of the Government;" though the President would not neglect works of defence and public utility. Regarding a ready communication by land between all the States as essential to the defence of each, he contemplates a road to unite the shores of the Atlantic with the Pacific. He is not ready to say in what mode the Government could most wisely and most economically aid in accomplishing this great and necessary work; but with a superabundant revenue, and a conviction that the duty of the Government cannot be fulfilled without a ready communication between all the States of the Union, it will not be long before, somehow or other, San Francisco will be connected by rail with New York.

On the whole, Mr. Buchanan's inaugural address is plain, clear, and rational; making us hope from his Administration a just system of foreign policy, and a domestic policy calculated to assuage internal animosities, stop violent contentions, check official corruption, and promote social improvement. All Europe is interested in his success, for its prosperity and freedom will be increased by the increased prosperity and increased freedom of the great country which is destined to be the home of continual streams of emigrants from Europe.

THE relations of two such States as Sardinia and Austria can never become cordial as long as the latter retains a footing in Italy. It is not because the one is constitutional and the other despotic that their mutual antipathy exists. Great Britain and France are exceedingly good friends, although their forms of government differ so widely; and Sardinia and Austria might be closely united in political friendship were Austria purely an Austrian and not an Italian Power. Deprived of Lombardy and Venice, or having exchanged those provinces, by her own free will and the consent of Europe, for Moldavia and Wallachia, the Court of Vienna would have no more reason to quarrel with Sardinia than with Hanover or Portugal. But under actual circumstances friendship is impossible between Vienna and Turin; and peace is only kept because Europe will not allow them to go to war. Austria is in so false a position in Italy that she can take no step to right herself, except one great step, which she never will take, unless upon compulsion, and in the mêlée of a European struggle. That step is to go out of Italy altogether, and leave the Italians to themselves. This might have been managed in the years 1853 and 1854 to the great advantage of the whole of civilised Europe, and to the detriment of no Power except Russia, which merited punishment, and ought to have received it. But this consummation was prevented by the timidity of British and French statesmen, and in a greater degree by the pusillanimity of Austria herself. Ultimately a peace, or the semblance of one, was made, leaving Italy unsatisfied, and with fire smouldering in the hearts of her people, needing only an accident to break out into flames. It certainly is not the policy of Sardinia, who is weak in men and money, to quarrel with a strong Power like Austria; but surely the statesmen of Austria—if any such there be—should see still more clearly that it is not their policy to quarrel with Sardinia. The greater the sorenes that Austria betrays with regard to Italy, or any Italian State, the greater the encouragement that will be afforded to the malcontents of Lombardy and Venice, and the more vivid the hopes that will be excited wherever Italian patriotism exists, whether it be at Rome, at Naples, at Florence, at Milan, or at Turin. The Emperor of Austria ought not to have expected on his visit to Italy that the King of Sardinia would offer him any congratulations. He ought not to have been surprised or offended if the free press of Turin and Genoa commented upon his reception at Milan and Venice as a free press has the habit of commenting upon public events of such high importance and significancy. He ought not to have blamed the King of Sardinia for declining to interfere with the press. He ought not to have made a personal matter of such refusal. He ought not to have instructed Count Buol to lecture an independent Monarch on the internal government of his States, especially when the independent Monarch was in the strict exercise of his right. And, lastly, he should not have betrayed his feelings by the withdrawal of his Ambassador from Turin as he has lately done, and by the dismissal of the Sardinian Ambassador from Vienna. Of course the Emperor of Austria will proceed no further. He will not declare war against Sardinia; and Sardinia, on her part, being the weaker vessel, will submit to the affront, and find out, if she have not already made the discovery, that Turin will be none the worse for the absence of the Austrian Envoy; and that the world will wag quite as merrily as of yore, although there is one Italian the less in the courtly circles of Vienna. In such a dispute all the loss is on the part of Austria, and all the gain on the part of Sardinia. Austria loses dignity and Sardinia gains the sympathy of all the Italians; whilst, by a natural but none the less deplorable complication, Russia, which dislikes revolutions, but which dislikes Austria still more, takes pains to show the Italians that, come what will, she will not do in Italy what she did in Hungary. The Empress Dowager of Russia goes to Nice for the benefit of her health, and the Grand Duke Constantine joins his mother in that city; but they avoid the Austrian dominions on their way. They make an inconvenient circuit in order not to set foot on the Austrian soil; and all Italy, except the Pope and the priests of Rome, and the King and the lazzaroni of Naples, take courage from the circumstance and the meaning that lies beneath it. The question of Italy is complicated enough in itself; but of all the Powers on the earth Austria is not the one that by any display of personal pique, or undue susceptibility, should add to the difficulties that beset it.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ST. THOMAS CHARTERHOUSE, GOLDEN-LANE, SCHOOL.—A dinner was given at the Albion Tavern, in Aldersgate-street, on Wednesday, to commemorate the opening of this school (an Engraving of which appeared in our Journal of last week). Lord John Russell presided, and about a hundred gentlemen, clergymen, and others, who take an interest in the education of the people, gathered round him on the occasion. The sum of £495 was collected for the support of the schools. We have great pleasure in stating that the labours of the Rev Mr. Rogers have not passed without recognition from her Majesty, for the announcement was made in the room, and received in a spirit of congratulation, that he had been appointed one of the Queen's chaplains.

LONDON ORPHAN ASYLUM, CLAPTON.—The forty-second anniversary festival of this charity was celebrated on Wednesday, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate street, under the presidency of the Marquis of Westminster. The noble chairman was supported by Sir John Boileau, the Ven. Archdeacon Robinson, Sheriff Mechi, William Kirby, Esq., James Capel, Esq., Professor Christmas, and 140 gentlemen, including several leading merchants and influential persons who take a strong interest in the cause of charity. The subscriptions announced in the course of the evening amounted to £3358 11s., including £100 from the chairman, and £1000 from an anonymous donor. The above sum exceeds by several hundreds that collected on any previous occasion.

ORPHAN WORKING SCHOOL.—The centenary festival of this institution was held at the London Tavern, on Wednesday; the Duke of Argyll in the chair. After the usual loyal and appropriate toasts the national anthem was sung by the children of the school in a manner which elicited the praise of all present. In the course of the evening a subscription was made for carrying out the objects of the institution, and the sum subscribed amounted to £1260. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales appears as a contributor to the extent of £260.

THE KNIGHTSBRIDGE CHURCH DISPUTE; WESTERTON v. LIDDELL: JUDGMENT. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the appeals of Liddell v. Westerton, and Liddell v. Beal, from the Court of Arches, delivered judgment on Saturday last. Their Lordships have concluded that crosses, as distinguished from crucifixes, having been in use as ornaments for churches from the earliest periods of Christianity, are admissible when not used as objects of superstitious reverence; and that the wooden cross erected on the chancel screen for St. Barnabas, being considered merely architectural, they advise her Majesty to reverse the judgment, considering that the laws in force respecting the consecration of any building for a church, and which forbade any subsequent alteration without a faculty from the ordinary, were sufficient to prevent any abuse in that respect. Upon the question whether the stone structure as a communion-table within the meaning of the canons and rubric, their Lordships are clearly of opinion that it is not, and they have also given a similar opinion with regard to the existence of a cross attached to the communion-table of St. Paul's, and they, therefore, recommend that upon these points the decree complained of should be affirmed. They also recommend a reversal of the sentence in reference to the credence-tables and the embroidered cloths, thinking that the question of the suitability of the cloths might be left to the discretion of the ordinary. Upon the question of the embroidered linen and lace used on the communion-table at the time of the ministration of the holy communion, the rubric and canon proscribed the use of a fair white linen cloth, and both the learned Judges in the court below had been of opinion that embroidery and lace were not consistent with the meaning of that expression, and in this view their Lordships concurred; and they therefore advised her Majesty to affirm the decree—stating, however, that they were not disposed in any case to restrict, within narrower limits than the law had imposed, the discretion which, within those limits, is justly allowed to congregations by the rule both of the Ecclesiastical and Common Law Courts. The effect of these judgments will be, just so much of the sentence of the Arches Court on each case as awards costs against the appellants must be reversed, and that in those proceedings, as well as in the present appeals, each party will have to bear his own costs.

HEALTH OF LONDON.—The total number of deaths registered in London, which in the previous week was 1156, was, in the week that ended last Saturday, 1195, of which 627 were deaths of males, and 568 those of females. In the ten years 1847-56 the average number of deaths in the weeks corresponding with last week was 1198, which almost entirely agrees with the number now returned; but as last week's deaths occurred in an increased population, the average must be raised for the purpose of comparison proportionately to the increase, in which case it will become 1318. Hence it appears that 123 persons more died last week whose names would have been inscribed on the registers if the average rate of mortality had prevailed. Eight nonagenarians died in the week; the oldest were a nurse who died in Walworth at the age of 94 years, a gentleman who died at the same age in Upper Charlotte-street, Tottenham court road, and a widow in the German Jews' Hospital at Mile-end, who had reached the age of 90 years. Last week the births of 939 boys and 916 girls, in all 1855 children, were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1847-56 the average number was 1603.

THE LATE GREAT FRAUDS ON THE CITY OF LONDON UNION.—A meeting of representatives of the parishes in the City of London Union affected by the recent frauds of Paul and Manini was held at Radley's Hotel, Blackfriars, on Wednesday, to consider the best means to be adopted for the protection of the ratepayers; Mr. H. Webb in the chair. Mr. Newbon read the opinion of Mr. Garth, of the common-law bar, which has already been published, that the parish cannot be legally required to defray the losses occasioned by the defalcations of Paul and Manini. Mr. Newbon said that the parish of St. Alban, Blackfriars, acting on this opinion, had given orders to resist payment. Mr. Jones, as the representative of St. Stephen's, Coleman-street, laid before the meeting the opinions of Mr. Serjeant Byles and Mr. Kennedy to the same effect. Mr. Wilson, on behalf of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, read the opinion of Mr. Pashley, Q.C., who thought that the burden should fall on those who appointed Manini. Mr. Newbon read another opinion from Mr. R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. Sargent, to the effect that the guardians, who gave Manini an illegal order to pay the moneys he collected to the treasurer of the union, instead of the overseers of the parishes, were liable. Some discussion ensued, after which Mr. Wilson moved the following resolution:—"That in the opinion of this meeting the late call of the guardians of the City of London Union on the various parishes is, so far as it relates to the defalcations of Paul and Manini, is illegal, and should be resisted." Mr. Cosgrave seconded the motion, which was put and carried. Another resolution was carried, that the representatives of the various vestries should call the ratepayers together, and propose to them to contribute ratesably to the expenses that would be incurred in resisting this demand.

FIRE AT THE CLARENDON HOTEL.—This extensive establishment, situate in Albemarle-street, Piccadilly, next to the Royal Institution, and extending back to Old Bond-street, narrowly escaped destruction by fire on Wednesday afternoon. About half-past one o'clock smoke was observed issuing from what was first supposed to be the upper part of the Royal Institution, but shortly the roof of the Clarendon Hotel (that portion fronting Albemarle street was discovered to be in flames. The alarm spread throughout the West end, and for a time the most disastrous consequences were apprehended. The firemen, however, prevented the fire from descending, and ultimately confined the damage to the destruction of the roof, although the water poured down into the suite of rooms below and saturated the contents. It appears that on Tuesday evening one of the hotel chimneys caught fire, and was allowed to burn itself out. Some sparks were probably carried underneath the slating of the roof, and resting on some of the timbers there smouldered and produced the mischief.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRES IN THE STRAND.—On Monday night a fire broke out, shortly before nine o'clock, in the warehouse of Messrs. Watkinson, upholsterers, 224, Strand. The house, which ran back to the depth of the Temple, was situated at an equal distance between Temple and Essex-street places, to neither of which is there any thoroughfare. As soon as the fire in the warehouse of Mr. Watkinson had got hold of the premises the combustible articles there shot forth from the windows in a shower of flames, which in a very few minutes ignited the rear of the houses in Temple and Palsgrave places. Notwithstanding the most strenuous exertions of the firemen the whole of Mr. Watkinson's extensive warehouses were completely gutted, and the stock of Messrs. Lee and Brown both severely damaged by the heat, and the adjoining premises mentioned from Thanet to Temple-place were more or less damaged by fire and water. On Tuesday morning at half past three o'clock a fire broke out on the premises of Mr. G. Wilson, naturalist, No. 407, Strand, a few doors from Somerset-house. The police raised the alarm, but the fire was not subdued until the police were assisted, and the engines, belonging to Mr. G. Gerrard, chemist, and Messrs. Wilson and Gandar, watchmakers, were damaged by fire and water.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PARLIAMENT met for the last time on Saturday, and was prorogued by a brief speech from the Lord Chancellor, in the name of the Sovereign. The speech announced an immediate dissolution, and the same night the writs were flying away to the constituencies. The borough elections will have taken place in the week now expiring, the counties making their choices in the course of the week that is coming. Everything betokens the most complete overthrow for the least sanguine hopes of the coalition, or combination, or concurrence of atoms, or fusion, or by whatever other euphuistic name the faction is to escape its right appellation. The majority who will give Lord Palmerston their adherence will be so large that Lord Derby may with a quiet conscience devote himself to the preliminaries of the Epsom National Convention that bears his name, while his "three serving-men" may, if they please, turn in earnest to the service of a country which places too high a value on their patriotism to think of appraising it at a salary. Lord Palmerston's address, at once bold and adroit, puts the case of the China crisis in the way in which sensible and practical men regard it, and the direful abuse which is therefore lavished upon it by the peacemongering organs is as natural as contemptible. "But we can give the losers leave to chide."

Our Ambassador to the United States, Lord Napier, has received a very cordial welcome from the New York Chamber of Commerce. The address spoke earnestly of the necessity of a continued harmony of feeling and action between the two great nations of the East and West—sentiments duly reciprocated by Lord Napier. He then proceeded to Washington, which has been crowded with visitors brought by the inauguration of Mr President Buchanan, who appears to have been besieged by place-hunters with relentless and unprecedented severity. The inaugural address is pacific and sensible, and its tone is in complete conformity with the requisitions of the American Constitution. On the Kansas question the President declares that "every inhabitant of that district shall be secured in the exercise of his constitutional rights. He repudiates any desire on the part of America to acquire fresh territory, except by means in accordance with justice and honour. A decision by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court—to the effect that the Act of Congress prohibiting citizens from holding slave property north of a certain line is not warranted by the Constitution, and is therefore void—is occasioning an extraordinary sensation, to use the stereotype phrase, and makes us think that it is as well for Englishmen that their Campbells and Cockburns have only to administer the law as it is, instead of unsettling society by reopening questions closed by the Legislature. The late President, Mr. Pierce, had been exerting himself, with success, to procure the Senate's approbation of the Dallas-Clarendon Treaty; and it should be recorded to the credit of an unsatisfactory official that, though dismissed with no great éclat, he manifested good feeling towards his successor, and abstained from the pettiness not uncommon to small men so situated. No circumstance in his official life has become him like the leaving it.

The Speaker of the late House of Commons has received his reward, having been gazetted on Tuesday as Lord Eversley of Heckfield. He carries with him into his comparative retirement the good wishes of all who knew him, either in his personal or his official capacity. The choice of his successor has become involved in difficulty. It was understood that the Solicitor-General, Mr. Wortley, was to be the Ministerial candidate; but, to every one's regret, this estimable gentleman has been suffering under illness so severe as to make it improbable that he will even be able to meet his constituents. His address, which contains but two paragraphs, adverts to the circumstances. To choose an individual so situated would be utterly unadvisable. But the Liberal side of the House does not seem to furnish any other very desirable candidate. Sir George Grey's health would disqualify him; Mr. Baines, though an excellent man, is not the sort of man wanted; nor is Mr. Fitzroy, with sundry special merits of his own. It is far from improbable, therefore, that the Ministerialiste, who will come in so strongly reinforced as to be able to put any man they may like into the chair, will overlook political differences, and concede the election of Mr. Walpole, who is liked by every one, who is a gentleman by birth, by character, and by manners, and whose name and descent would seem to give him claim to position in an English House of Commons. There is also Sir F. Thesiger, another popular man, whose election would give no dissatisfaction anywhere. It is curious that the Conservatives should be able to supply two men, either of whom would be acceptable, and the Liberals not one; but the office is a peculiar one, and party considerations should not prevent its being suitably filled. The House does not want to place the best statesman, but the best "Speaker," in Lord Eversley's chair.

The journals are so completely "choked up" with election addresses and election intelligence, that ordinary social topics are dealt with in a very condensed form, and lady readers (not engaged in canvasses) declare the papers to be totally unreadable. A few trials and other incidents may, however, be gleaned by an observant reader. The final decision in the case of the Tractarian churches at Pimlico and Knightsbridge has been given, and Mr. Westerton relied upon it as a stimulus to his supporters in the recent battle has the coolness to aspire to, he will have been sadly disappointed for Mr Pemberton Leigh's judgment goes against him on several points. The crosses on the screens may stand, for they are but architectural ornament. The altar must be taken away and a table substituted; but, as the same embroidered cloth may be used, as now, for covering, the article will bear the same appearance in the eyes of the congregation. The credence-tables may also remain. The only visible victory is the taking away the embroidered linen and lace from the sacrament-table. Each party pays its own costs. The question having now been finally settled, not by the church authorities (for the parties have "gone to law before the 'seculars,' and not before the saints"), it is to be hoped that the equally feeble minds which are distressed by the absence of disturbed by the presence of some carving and millinery will try to address themselves to higher and worthier consi[illegible].

SHOP OF THE CHINESE BAKER, ESING (ALUM), AT VICTORIA, HONG-KONG.

THE POISONINGS AT HONG-KONG.

IN our Journal of last week we gave a pretty full account of this atrocious affair from the Hong-Kong Register. Two or three hundred people, altogether, had partaken of the poisoned bread, but no lives had been lost.

Our Correspondent writes from Hong-Hong, Jan. 30, 1857.—"I send you a Sketch of the house of Keing (properly called Alum) the baker who supplied the bread poisoned with arsenic from which so many people suffered in Hong-Kong, and who, with his father and eight of his workmen, are now on their trial for that crime. Also, a picture of Esing's examination at the police-office. The Chinese in profile is Alum; the full-face is his father; and the Chinese woman behind is one of his wives. These are drawn by a Portuguese named Baptista, who is here thought a clever artist, and who was a pupil of Chinery."

Private letters from the Chinese Seas, received at Paris, state that Alum had been tried before a Council of War legally constituted, and convicted of an attempt to poison the English Chargé d'Affaires and his family. The man was condemned to death and shot together with three of his accomplices.

NAVAL REINFORCEMENTS FOR THE CHINA SQUADRON

NAVAL REINFORCEMENTS FOR THE CHINA SQUADRON.

THE vessels in the accompanying Sketch are those which are now being commissioned in this country and dispatched with troops to China. The following fleet of ships and gun-boats have been selected for that purpose:—Sanspariel, 71; Shannon, 51; Retribution, 28; Furious, 16; Transit, 6; Himalaya, 6; Adventure, 6; Assistance 6 Gun-boats Nimrod, 6, Snapper, 4, Cormorant, 4, Viper, 4, Algerine, 2, Fern, 2, Banterer, 2, Jones, 2, Brave 2, Beagle, 2, Watchful, 2, Ivy, 2, Woodcock, 2, Ensted 2, Clown, 2, Tracer, 2, Bouncer, 2. Of these, the three first-named vessels left last week. In addition to this fleet from England and those already assembled at the seat of war, a far more powerful reinforcement than either of these is ordered from neighbouring stations to join Admiral Seymour's squadron with all dispatch, and there is no doubt at the time we are writing, but that he has received material assistance from this source.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE General Commanding-in-Chief visited Portsmouth on Monday last to inspect the troops about to embark from that garrison for China. His Royal Highness was received at the Portsmouth station at eleven o'clock by Major-General Breton, commanding the South-West District. Chargers for the Duke of Cambridge and Staff were provided by yard to inspect the Transit troop-ship, about to convey a part of the 90th Foot to China. The Duke was received at the Dockyard by Vice-Admiral Sir George Seymour Rear Admiral Superintendent Martin, and the Dockyard Staff, and conducted over the Transit, having minutely inspected which the proceeded to Southsea common to inspect the troops. There were several thousand of spectators on the ground to view the inspection of the troops which comprised 2 field officers, 7 captains, 26 subalterns, 7 staff 47 sergeants 25 drummers &c. and 1 rank and file of the 23rd Royal Welsh Fusiliers, 4 field officers, 10 captains 26 subalterns, 7 staff 50 sergeants, 16 drummers &c., and 812 rank and file of the 22nd Foot; 4 field officers 10 captains 26 subalterns 7 staff 50 sergeants, 22 drummers &c. and 847 rank and file of the 19th Light Infantry total, 2162 On arriving on the ground the Duke was received with a general salute, and the Major-General Breton put the troops into quick order, when they went through all the evolutions incidental to an official inspection on field day exactly like it. At the conclusion of the movements the troops formed hollow square from the centre of which the Duke addressed them, expressing his high admiration of the unusually efficient manner in which they had performed the various manœuvres, the precision of their movements and their soldierly front, proving themselves capable of adding to the fame of their several regiments and the glory of British arms when further they might be engaged. The bands played the National Anthem and the Royal corps of all the hold for the Government House, where the Duke of Cambridge and Staff were entertained at luncheon by Major-General Breton, the Governor of the garrison.

ON Monday last upwards of 120 troops belonging to the Provisional Battalion at Chatham, with eight officers, were marched from Chatham Barracks to the fortification near Prince Henry's bastion, for the purpose of going through a course of escalading instructions with the troops of the Royal Engineers. It is intended to have the whole of the non-commissioned officers and men of the regiments stationed at Chatham instructed in escalading operations during the ensuing summer.

THE regulations for the ordinary summer drills were on Saturday issued to the commanding officers of battalions at Woolwich, withdrawing the orders for the country march, which has taken place on Monday during winter, and substituting the usual field drills. The regimental commands presented a scene of much attraction on Monday morning. Eight divisions of the Royal Marine forces, accompanied by their respective officers and attended by the regimental band, were drawn out, under the command of Colonel Stransham, C.B., Second Commandant of the Marine garrison at Woolwich, and after marching past they were put through a series of battalion movements and light manœuvres, and finished up with a sham sling order over the field. The whole of the Royal Artillery recruits were likewise drawn out in review order, and went through the usual routine of field exercises, firing volleys &c. in order.

THE four companies of Artillery under orders for China were inspected at Woolwich, on Monday morning, by Colonel Hardinge, Acting Commandant, attended by Colonel Bloomfield, Brigade-Major Shaw, and the garrison Staff. Passing down the lines, the Colonel addressed the men individually, and inquired if they had any complaints to make, which was answered in every instance in the negative. The appearance of the troops indicated the most perfect health and superior military deportment. Each company consists of two Captains, two Field Lieutenants, one Surgeon, fourteen non-commissioned officers, and 128 gunners. No transport-ship has up to the present been appointed for conveying them.

THE freight-ship Violet, from the London Docks, was moored at Woolwich Arsenal on Wednesday for the purpose of shipping a cargo of war stores for China. A portion of the freight will consist of three complete three pounder carriages, which are in course of being fitted out in the Royal Carriage Department of the Arsenal for use in China. These small batteries are intended for mountain service, and to be removed, as may be necessary, in the native ponies. The ammunition wage one, which are covered with tarpaulin, are after the size of an ordinary handbarrow.

THE 23rd Company of Royal Engineers, and the detachment of 200 orderlies of the Medical Staff Corps, at Chatham, are to be held in readiness for immediate embarkation for service in China. The whole of the non-commissioned officers and men have been inspected, and they are in readiness for embarkation at instant notice.

The range of temperature during the week was 27 degrees.

A heavy fall of snow took place on the morning and forenoon of March 2nd, and occasional heavy snow showers were falling during the evening of the 3rd and 4th. The ground was covered to the depth of an inch at midnight on the 3rd, but by the afternoon of the 4th it had almost disappeared by the following morning, though a few showers fell during the forenoon of the 5th. Rain was falling on the forenoon and afternoon of the 6th and a few drops on the afternoon of the 7th. The ground was covered with four inches of fresh snow on the morning of the 8th.

The sky was clear on the morning of the 19th, on the morning of the 21st, and on the night of the 23rd; and on the latter occasion the zodiacal light was noticed. The weather was very rough and stormy throughout the 22nd. Mist lay about the horizon on the days of the 19th and 20th.

MARCH 24. For 20·88 inch—last quarter, March 17, read 29·88.

From March 20th, 10 a.m., till March 21st, 10 p.m., the total movement of the wind in 24 hours was 1190 miles. From 8 a.m. till 4 p.m. of the 21st, when the pole was at its height, the average velocity of the wind was 50 miles per hour.

The observations were obtained from observations made at 6h. and 10h. a.m., and 2h., 6h., and 10h. p.m., on each day, except Sunday, when the first observation is omitted. The corrections for diurnal variation are taken from the Tables of Mr. Glaisher. The "Dew-point" and "Relative Humidity" are calculated, from observations of the dry and wet bulb Thermometers, by Dr Apjohn's Formula and Dalton's Tables of the Tension of Vapour. The movement of the wind is given by a self recording Robinson's Anemometer, the amount stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

EARL AMHERST.

THE RIGHT HON. WILLIAM PITT AMHERST, G.C.H., Earl Amherst, of Arracan, in the East Indies, Viscount Holmesdale of Holmesdale in the county of Kent and Baron Amherst, of Montreal, in the same county, and a Privy Councillor, was the only son of Lieutenant-General William Amherst, and nephew of the celebrated Commander in Chief of the British Army in North America, Jeffery Amherst, who was made Baron Amherst in 1776, and Baron Amherst with an extended Dominion in 1786. William Pitt, Earl Amherst, the subject of this notice, was born in January, 1773. He was educated at Christchurch, Oxford, where he graduated as B.A. and M.A. He succeeded his uncle in his second Barony of Amherst the 3rd August, 1797. He was in 1816 appointed Ambassador Extraordinary to the Emperor of China. He left England in the Alceste, in the February of 1816, on this mission and arrived at Pekin, but, when there, he refused to salute to the kneeling ceremonies of the Imperial Court, and was passed sideways to the Emperor's presence, thus his Embassy proved useless. On his return in the Alceste he was wrecked off the Island of Pulo-Leat. Further on his way back he visited the Emperor Napoleon at St Helena and was received with extraordinary kindness. He subsequently was appointed Governor-General of India, and for his services the peerage on the 3rd December, 1826 created Earl Amherst and Viscount Holmesdale. The Earl married first, the 25th July, 1802 Sarah, Countess Dowager of Plymouth, relict of Other-Hi-kinson the fifth Earl of Plymouth and daughter of Lord Archer, by which lady (who died in 1838) he had no issue and one daughter the latter is the wife of Sir John Hay Williams, Bart., of Bodelwyddan. Earl Amherst married again on the 26th May, 1825, by special warrant, Sarah Countess Dowager of Plymouth viz. Mary, the relict of Other-Archer second Earl of Plymouth and eldest daughter and heiress of John Frederick, third Duke of Dorset by which lady who survives him, he had no issue. Earl Amherst, earlier his social career entered into politics into the magnificent seclusion of his beautiful seat, Knole near Sevenoaks and devoted himself chiefly to the management and improvement of his Kentish estates and the fostering of his peasantry there. His Lordship, until very general regret, died at Knole on the 13th inst. He is succeeded by his only son, William Pitt, Viscount Holmesdale, now second Earl Amherst, who was born in 1805, and married, in 1834, Gertrude, sixth daughter of the Hon. and Right Rev Hugh Percy Bishop of Carlisle by whom he has had issue six sons and six daughters: his eldest son, William Archer, is a Captain in the Guards.

LADY ELIZABETH MARY BAKER

THE LADY ELIZABETH MARY BAKER was the fourth daughter of William Robert 2nd Duke of Leinster, by his wife Emma Lady Lady daughter and heiress of Sir George Fowler 3rd Lord St George, and was sister of the present Duke of Leinster She was born the 30th October, 1805, and was married, the 22nd July, 1825, to Sir Edward Thomas Baker, first Baronet, of Ranston, Dorset, who connected he filled many important public offices in Canada and Ireland. He was for nineteen years Secretary for the Irish Military Department. He died the 4th March, 1825, leaving by his marriage with Lady Elizabeth four sons and four daughters. The eldest son, Sir Edward Baker, Baker, Bart., two other sons died others in 1847 and the fourth son, the Rev Talbot Hastings Bendall Baker, is Rector of Preston Weymouth. One of Lady Elizabeth's daughters, one, Geraldine Laura is the wife of H Rutt Lane Esq., of Sondes Place Surrey, and another, the eldest surviving Emilia Maria is married to Thomas Mills Goodlake Esq., of Wadley House Berks, and her son, G. L. Goodlake is a Captain in the Coldstream Guards. Has obtained the Victoria Cross. Lady Elizabeth Baker died on the 5th ultimo.

MR. SERJEANT WILKINS.

CHARLES WILKINS, Esq., Serjeant-at-Law with a patent of precedence, one of the most eloquent and popular advocates of his time, was the son of a gentleman in the medical profession at Islington. He himself was also educated for the practice of surgery and medicine; but he was induced, no doubt from a conviction of his own powers of speaking, to relinquish the latter pursuit and to enter the forensic arena. He was called to the English Bar by the Hon. Society of the Inner Temple, on the 12th of June, 1835, and joined the Northern Circuit. He first came into notice as an able defender of prisoners at the Quarter Sessions for the Middlesex and at the Liverpool Assizes. He afterwards went the West Riding Sessions, and won further distinction there and in the criminal courts of York and other towns of the circuit. He was also beginning to obtain a reputation in the Central Criminal Court in London, when, in 1845, he was made a Serjeant-at-Law, and he then attached himself more to the civil side of the Common Law Courts. His success speedily increased. His business in town, and especially on the Northern Circuit, became enormous. As a forensic orator and examiner of witnesses Mr. Serjeant Wilkins had indeed few equals. His effect in producing feelings, whether serious or mirthful, on his audience was not unlike what is related of Curran. His tact and skill in dealing with an adverse, and particularly with an unwilling, witness were wonderful. Serjeant Wilkins was latterly employed in most great cases which occurred in the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, and at the Liverpool Assizes. He afterwards went the West Riding Sessions, and won further distinction there and in the criminal courts of York and other towns of the circuit. His

MUSIC.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC gave the first concert of the season, for the exhibition of the pupils, on Tuesday morning, at the Institution, in Tenterden-street. The rooms were crowded with an assemblage of amateurs who take an interest in the progress of music in England, the relatives and friends of the pupils, and the most eminent members of the musical profession. Princes Albert honoured the concert with his presence; and all the Professors of the Academy were presented to his Royal Highness by the Earl of Westmoreland, the chairman of the Committee of Management. The concert consisted of an excellent selection of classical music, chiefly sacred, as being appropriate to the season of Lent. The instrumental orchestra and chorus were complete and powerful. Mr. Lucas acted as conductor. The principal pieces performed were Mendelssohn's sacred cantata "Praise Jehovah" the solo parts sung by Miss White, Miss Shepherd, Mr Goodban, and Mr. Towers. Beethoven's Choral Fantasia for the pianoforte orchestra, and chorus the piano part played by Miss Pauline a young lady of great talent, who promises to be a first-rate pianist; a selection from Costa's "Eli;" and a selection from Rossini's "Stabat Mater." These, and several other things, were executed in a manner which did great honour to the youthful performers and their instructors. Miss Whyte, Miss Spiller, Miss Shepherd, and Miss Rosbroke, especially distinguished themselves. On this occasion there were not, as there generally are, any specimens of the proficiency of the pupils in the highest branch of their studies —the art of composition. But this department, we know, is not neglected; and we shall, doubtless, have proofs, in the course of the season, of the attention which it receives.

THE first of MR. WALTER MACFARREN'S pianoforte concerts took place on Monday evening, at the Queen Anne-street Rooms. His character as a pianist was most successfully tested by his able performance of Mendelssohn's fantasia in F sharp minor; of his own two very pleasing little pieces, "Madeline" and "May-morn;" of Mozart's duet in F, along with Mr. Cipriani Potter; of Beethoven's sonata in C minor for the piano and violin, with Mr. Sainton; and of his own admirable sonata (MS.) for the same instruments, and with his own admirable sextet. His two expressive songs to the exquisite the same excellent artist. His two expressive songs to the exquisite poetry of Burns, and some other vocal pieces, were charmingly sung by Miss Dolby. The concert altogether was highly interesting and successful.

ON Wednesday evening HERR PAUER, the eminent composer and pianist, began a series of soirées musicales, at Willis's Rooms, which were crowded with fashionable company. The entertainment was of high excellence. Its most remarkable feature was M. Pauer's own quintet in E major for the pianoforte, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon, in which he was accompanied by Messrs. Barret, Lazarus, Harper, and Hausser. It is a masterly work, combining the symmetrical forms and graceful melodies of the Mozart school with the brilliant execution of the present time. The other principal pieces were Mendelssohn's sonata in D for the piano and violoncello beautifully played by M. Pauer and Signor Piatti, Beethoven's trio in E flat. Op. 70, in which Pauer was accompanied by Molique and Piatti, and a grand forte solo, "Morgen wanderung," composed and performed by Herr Pauer Several German lieder were charmingly sung by Madame Pauer, who has a fine contralto voice, and is an accomplished artist.

THE great success of MISS ARABELLA GODDARD'S Chamber Pianoforte Concerts, at her residence in Welbeck-street, has induced her to give a second series, which began on Wednesday evening her to give a second series, which began on Wednesday evening Having fully described the concerts of the former series, it is sufficient now to say that the concert of Wednesday was of a similar character, equally excellent, and equally successful. Her rooms were crowded to the doors, and the audience were enchanted with the brilliancy, force, delicacy, and expression of her various performances

THE Italian Operas at the Dublin Theatre Royal go on with undiminished success. Miss Catherine Hayes has appeared in a variety of characters—Lucia, Norma, Amina (in "Don Pasquale"), and, lastly, of Linda di Chamouni, which she performed on Monday last. In all of these parts she has been received with acclamations by crowded houses. The operas, in their ensemble, are got up and performed in a manner not unworthy of the Irish metropolis, and we observe, in particular, that Mr. Tennant, the young tenor-singer, is making decided progress in public favour.

MR. GYE has announced the opening of the Royal Italian Opera, at the Lyceum Theatre, on the 14th of April, the same night on which her Majesty's Theatre is to open.

M. JULLIEN, it is said, with his famous orchestra, is about to make the tour of the principal towns in Holland.

VERDI has produced a new opera at Venice. It is called "Simone Boccanera." The accounts of its success are so conflicting that it is impossible at present to come at the truth.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER-HALL.—The customary annual performance of the "Messiah" takes place on Wednesday, the 8th of April. Madame Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Weiss, principal vocalists.

THE THEATRES, &c.

HAYMARKET.—A new piece, produced on Thursday week, and written by Mr. Bayle Bernard, has been particularly unfortunate. It is entitled "A Life's Trial," is in four acts, and covers a period of ten years, thus giving to each of the individuals time for accomplishing a change of fortune, character, and conduct. The action, of course, is exceedingly desultory; and, though the illustrative scenes are picturesque and interesting from local associations, we cannot say that the business is at all exciting, or comes specially home to the bosom. The merit for the most part consists in clever minute stage manipulations; and when it was discovered that these small doings led to a still smaller result in the catastrophe, the dissatisfaction of the audience was, indeed, audibly expressed. Mr. Buckstone's character of the grocer who, in sping the gentleman, loses his business, and is reduced to carrying parcels at an inn, has some humour in it; and another character supported by Mr. Compton, of a Captain Tatters, who becomes a showman and teacher of calisthenics, is also amusing, though far from novel. Mr. Bernard himself having already in previous productions worked the type threadbare. Mr. W. Farren was very successful with a little part, called Mr. Wyndhams, and, in a passage of arms with his rival, Mr. Hawksworth (Mr. Howe), gave so energetic an utterance of passion that he was deservedly recalled at the end of one of the acts. So the attempt has been made to improve melodrama catastrophe since the first night, but Mrs of this sort are seldom recoverable.

LYCEUM.—The tragedy of "Hamlet" was revived on Friday week—the hero being, of course, performed by Mr. Dillon. All doubt having been now removed as to this gentleman's capacity to support Shakspearean characters, it is not necessary to enlarge on the subject. His performance of the melancholy Prince was natural and pathetic. The two points of tenderness—his friendship for Horatio, and his affection for Ophelia—were nicely picked out for dramatic illustration. The passion, however, both in those and other instances, was restrained within the limits of grace and beauty. The closet scene in particular was most effectively rendered, and at the same time judiciously subdued. Here, too, the appearance of the Ghost was admirably managed. The scene was painted on gauze, and thus the spectre was visible within the picture-frame, and passed along the transparent tapestried walls to the part where he makes his exit, without entering the chamber at all. We have but to add that the audience testified their approbation of Mr. Dillon's acting by calling him before the curtain three times in the course of the performance.

SADLER'S WELLS.—A young lady of the name of Rosina Pennell appeared on Monday in the characters of Constance in "The Love Chase," and Polly in "The Beggars' Opera."—In both she showed talent, though the characters selected for her début are suited neither to her physique nor personal appearance.

STANDARD.—On Saturday Mr. Phelps appeared for the first time at this theatre. The play was "The Bridal," and Melantius was powerfully played by Mr. Phelps. Mr. F. Robinson, who is jointly engaged with him, enacted Amintor, and received great applause. The house overflowed, and it is probable that this event altogether will inaugurate a new movement in East-end tactics.

PANORAMA OF MOSCOW.—Mr. Burford on Thursday opened to the public a grand picture of Moscow, with the coronation procession of the present Emperor into the Kremlin. The Imperial palace, the three cathedrals, towers, and gates, with their fantastic forms and parti-coloured domes, form a strikingly picturesque group; while the lower portion of the picture is peopled with the barbaric splendour of the coronation procession, thus giving busy life to the fine architectural picture. By its historic interest, as well as by its artistic character (it being painted in Mr. Burford's best manner), this new panorama will, doubtless, become a very popular sight of the season.

MR. OTTLEY'S LECTURE ON ART.—We understand that Mr. Ottley, having repeated his new illustrated lecture, "An Hour with the Old Masters," two or three times in the metropolis, with great success, will deliver it at the Manchester Athenæum on Monday next, and afterwards at other places in the manufacturing districts.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

NORTHAMPTON showed us Sam Rogers in the saddle for the first time this season, on Flacrow, as a winner of the Trial Stakes; Odd Trick, Huntington, and Lord Nelson (all winners) being behind him, with the unfortunate Wentworth, who nearly fell over Lord Nelson. Wells (the new bendict) won the "Guinea" on Fisherman; Nelson. Wells (the new benedict) won the "Guinea" on Fisherman; and St. Giles—who rose at once to 13 to 1 for Chester—managed the first great handicap of the year cleverly by a neck, after a head-and-head race to the half-distance with Skirmisher. Challoner did all a light hand could for his shifty horse; but we shall see him run still better when he is in Job Marson's or Will Abdale's more powerful hands on the Derby Day, for which event 25 to 1 is snapped up about him. Adamas was fifth out of the sixteen. Gemma di Vergy managed the Whittlebury, with his old jockey, Kendall, on his back; and the result of the running of the day, which was damp and cold, was to send Voletre to 3; to 1 in the Two Thousand betting for which the 1840-guinea Lord of the Hills will be, if right, a certain starter.

The meetings for next week are Ilsley, on Monday; Croxton-park on Tuesday and Wednesday, and Epsom Spring on Thursday. The stakes at Ilsley there are filled very fairly. The Belvoir Castle Stakes at Croxton embrace the names of the Derby favourite, M. D., Commotion, and Sir Colin, as well as that enormous Surplice yearling, and still untried three-year-old, Hunting Horn, brother to St. Hubert. Epsom has seven events. Polly Peachum has no penalty in the Two-year-old Stakes, where Heroine and Peregrine both figure; but the Doncaster running must have settled their relative forms. Fisherman, 9st. 2lb., will not improbably try his hand at the City and Suburban, and St. Giles (7st with penalty), Adamas, 6st. 8lb., Adamas, 6st. 4lb., Vaulter, 5st 11lb., and Admiral Lyons, 5st. 2lb., are all likely to be handy. We do not think Adamas must be lost sight of yet, as he looks quite a racehorse, and ran very forward for 1½ miles at Northampton. Fisherman, 9st., is also in the Great Metropolitan, with St. Giles, 6st. 12lb., and Dulcamara, 5st. 12lb., from the same stable, who is also backed for Chester. Lord Ribblesdale's second trial of the turf seems to be a lucky venture so far.

The mastership of the Craven Hounds is still open, and it is said that Mr. Henley Greaves is negotiating for Captain Thompson's old country. The Melton fields have been rather thin this week, owing to Northampton; and Will Goodall wears his boots once more, and seems none the worse for his accident. Mr. Gilmore is also nearly able to take the field again.

The North Staffordshire had their "best day of the season" last Friday. They found a rare fox in Mr. Wicksteed's New Gorse at Ilsley (a cover which was never known to fail), and rattled him away to Ingleseyy Brook, across the North Staffordshire line, through the pleasure-grounds of Lord Crewe, across the North-Western line near Crewe station, towards Wistaston, where he was headed. Skirting Nantwich, he ran to Stapeley, where "the red rogue" lay down quite spent in a small pit, till he was absolutely surrounded by the hounds. By one desperate bound he got rid of them once more, but was run into, after a two-mile ring, at Bartherton. Time, one hour fifty minutes, and the distance nearly twenty miles! Joe Maiden and his "American Leg" are wonderfully active, but he does not, as yet, hunt the hounds more than once a week, and the worthy master, Mr. W. Davenport, both handled and rode well to them on this day, as he did during the whole of last season, when Joe was on crutches.

Steeplechases come very thick this week. Oldham, Ilsley, Henley-in-Arden, and the North Warwickshire Hunt stand for Monday; Beckford and Sedgefield for Tuesday; Grantham for Thursday; Haydon bridge, Knighton (Radnorshire), and Tadcaster for Friday; and Windsor for Friday and Saturday.

On Friday, as we once heard a don remark near Putney-bridge, "the metropolis will awake to her annual gleam of consciousness that she has Universities," and the learned chivalry from Cam and Isis, with "sky blue" and "Waterloo blue" handkerchiefs, will be all astir. Oxford is said to be more confident this year than she was last.

BRITISH SAILORS IN VIRGINIA.—On Thursday last two free negroes, William Carter and John Powell, seamen on board the British barque Isabella, were arrested in our city for being absent from their vessel without leave, and were ordered by the Mayor to be punished with stripes. By virtue of an Act of Assembly in such cases made and provided The punishment was commuted, with the assent of the captain of the barque, to the payment of costs of arrest and other usual charges, to which, however, her Majesty's Consul, Mr. C. P. E. James, demurred, upon the ground that both were British subjects, and therefore exempt from the operation of the negro's being British subjects, and therefore exempt from the pecuniary penalty to which other free negroes were liable for a violation of the aforesaid Act of Assembly. Our worthy Mayor, however, maintained his authority in the matter, and gave her Majesty's representative the alternative to pay charges or submit to the punishment of the negroes, the former of which he adopted, under protest. The decision of the Mayor in this case is in strict conformity with State sovereignty, the maintenance of which is absolutely necessary for the preservation of the rights of the slave-holding States. Richmond Virginia Argus, Sept. If the South could not resist the North fight for despotism, we should soon see an abatement of the pretensions of the slaveocrats, and a great improvement in their conduct towards foreign countries.—New York Europeen.

SIR JOHN M'NEILL AND COLONEL TULLOCH.—In consequence of the recent vote of the House of Commons, Sir John M'Neill is, we believe, to be made a member of the Privy Council, having chosen that honour out of two placed in his option. Colonel Tulloch, we hear, is made, or to be made, a Civil K.C.B.—Scotsman.

THE NEUFCHATEL QUESTION.—The Indépendance Belge publishes the following despatch, dated "Paris, March 21":—"The Prussian Minister has just received the instructions which he awaited from his Government relative to Neufchâtel. They are to the effect, it is said, that the moment relative to Neufchâtel. They are to the effect, it is said, that the moment which his Majesty announces the maintenance of the Government relative to Neufchâtel will consent to treat upon the basis proposed by King Frederick William will consent to treat upon the basis proposed by the Conference, on the following conditions:—The title of Prince of Neufchâtel will remain attached to the crown of Prussia. The benevolent institutions at Neufchâtel shall be maintained and guaranteed. The pensions of the Royal domains shall continue to be paid to the King for the term of the Royal domains shall continue to be paid to the King for five years. The produce of the same, which amounts to about 100,000 francs a year, will serve to indemnify the Royalists for the sacrifices and losses they have undergone. His Majesty announces the maintenance of the Swiss neutrality. He likewise announces that he will proclaim a general amnesty, and bonâ fide a sincere and cordial reconciliation. All parties being thus placed on an impartial footing, the Royalists who have left the country will be allowed to return to it, and will be at liberty to live under the Government, according to the circumstances of the case.

SEVERAL French political prisoners who had been in confinement at Belle Isle have been set at liberty since the commencement of the month, their term of imprisonment having expired.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

THE news of the week relates almost entirely to Art. The far-famed Soulage Collection, imperfectly known in England by the abridged collection at Marlborough House, after having been refused—most unwillingly, we are told, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer (that Canton vote is still a serious matter) has been bought outright by the seven gentlemen constituting the Executive Committee of the Art-Treasures Exhibition at Manchester. Yes—seven wise men in Manchester have wisely bought for the sum of £13,500 what her Majesty's Government neglected to purchase for the nation—Government dreading (most foolishly) a hustings cry against them from Disraeli and Gladstone, from Cobden and Gibson, from Graham and Herbert, that Lord Palmerston and his "appendages" were purchasing at a large price what nobody else would purchase at any chasing at a large price what nobody else would purchase at any price, for hustings assertions are too frequently the very reverse of the actual truth. Well, these seven wise men of Manchester who have bought the Soulage's Collection for the Manchester Exhibition rejoice in the following names: Thomas Fairbairn, Esq. (Chairman), Thomas Ashton, Esq., William Entwisle, Esq., Joseph Heron, Esq. (Town Clerk), Edmund Potter, Esq., Sigismund J. Stern, Esq., and James Watts, Esq. (Mayor of Manchester). Nor has this public-spirited purchase been made by these gentlemen on any grounds other than purely public ones. At the close of the Art-Treasures Exhibition in October next, the seven men—such are the conditions of purchase—are to offer the Soulage Collection to the citizens of Manchester for the sum they gave for it. Should Manchester in its folly (for it has many cold fits of admiration) refuse to purchase, the collection will be offered a second time (still at the same price) to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being. Should the then holder of the purse-strings of the people act Sir George Lewis over again, the collection will be sold, as King Charles the First's collection was sold, at certain appraised prices. Any loss will be met by the seven wise men of Manchester, and blotted out from all further recollection; while any profit will be made cheerfully over by the aforesaid seven gentlemen to the original guarantees of the collection, who will forthwith apply the same to some public purpose connected with Art in England. Oddly enough, the seven gentlemen thus harmoniously working together for the national benefit are most inharmoniously in tune with respect to the Manchester election. Three are out-and-out partisans for Gibson and Bright, and three unmistakable hip-and-thigh men for Potter and Turner. By the time what we now write reaches Manchester in print, these seven public-spirited men will be fighting against one another in the Manchester election, commencing and closing on that day.

The Stanhope British Portrait Gallery Commission is eminently deserving the confidence of the public. The first acquisition of the committee was a gift of the far-famed Chandos portrait of Shakspeare, a present from the late Earl of Ellesmere; and the first purchase made by the commission is the portrait of Sir Walter Raleigh. We have not seen the Raleigh, but we hear very well of it from those on whose taste we can rely. It has a pedigree of nearly two hundred years. Aubrey thus describes it in the lives he drew up for old Anthony Wood:—"In the great parlour at Downton, at Mr Raleigh's, is a good piece (an original) of Sir Walter, in a white satin doublet, all embroidered with rich pearls, and a mighty rich chain of great pearls about his neck (the old servants have told me that the pearls were near as big as the painted ones)." The Stanhope-Macaulay-Carlyle-Carpenter and William Smith purchase is the Downton picture. We should like to see it by the side of the Longleat Raleigh, and by the side of the portrait which Mr. Gibson Craig possesses of the same remarkable man.

The effect of the lighting and paper in the British Portrait Gallery at the Art-Treasures Exhibition was tested on Wednesday last by hanging up Sir Joshua Reynolds's magnificent full-length portrait of the Minister, Earl of Bute. This fine picture is in a finer condition than it was known to have been when it passed from the easel of Sir Joshua to Caen-wood House, then the princely seat of the unpopular Prime Minister. Reynolds in painting this portrait stripped to the labour. He was disliked at Court, and Allan Ramsay, his then rival (he has distanced Dr. Johnson's "dear Allan" by many a length), was then high in reputation for an excellent full-length portrait he had newly completed of the same nobleman. Ramsay put on a rank with the greatest masters. He succeeded. Oddly enough, this picture (it belongs to Lord Wharncliffe) is not to be found in any catalogue of Sir Joshua's portraits. Manchester will make it known, and not very readily forgotten. But about the effect? The result was all and even more than was expected; the lighting perfect; the hue of the wall the very thing that pictures demand.

A curious document has recently turned to light—the "Diary and Account Book" of no less a person than Zincke, the miniature-painter, who flourished in Covent-garden (listen to this, Mr. Green!) when the Garden was in its ascendant. The manuscript supplies a daily list of his sitters—such as "Prior's Kitty," Lady Mary Wortley Montagu with her "Wortley Eyes," Lord Chesterfield's "Fanny blooming Fair," Horace Walpole's "Audrey Harrison," Pope's "Martha and Theresa Blount," Thomson's "Amanda," Lord Bolingbroke's "Villette," Swift's "Stella," and other celebrities of especial moment to all who collect the exquisite miniatures of this fascinating artist. The manuscript, it is said, will pass under the hammer of Messrs. Christie and Manson.

THE GENERAL THEATRICAL FUND DINNER will take place on Monday, April 6th, and not on the 12th, as stated in our Journal of last week.

ENGLISH VESSELS AT JAPAN.—It may be remembered that some short time back a Journal of Amsterdam announced that two English vessels had forced the port of Nagasaki, in Japan. The Débats confirms the following details of the incident:—"A circumstance of considerable interest, which lately took place, afforded the Emperor of Japan an occasion to declare the ills in favour of the European Powers. On the 11th December last two English vessels of war, after having visited the ports of Simoda and Hakodadi, appeared before Nagasaki, but were not allowed to enter by the Mandarin acting as governor. The two captains, however, strong in their right, penetrated into the port, and anchored within a couple of cannon shot of the batteries which remained silent. Any out of hostility against them. The next day they repaired with a numerous escort to the residence of the Governor, who refused to receive them, but who, at the same time, sent to declare that if they had any complaint to make, he would forward their representations to the Imperial Court, and transmit to them the reply. This he did most scrupulously. The two captains were to wait for the reply, right of remaining some time at Nagasaki, in conformity with the treaty, signed in 1854, between England and Japan. In about a fortnight after which the Emperor's answer arrived announcing that his Majesty, being desirous of extending the old and exclusive policy which had been given orders for the three ports of Simoda, Hakodadi, and Nagasaki to be open to the vessels of France, Russia, England, and the United States. Such vessels were to be permitted to refit there, to take in provisions, and to trade to a certain defined extent. The Emperor, in order to carry out that determination, issued an edict which was without delay posted up in every part of his dominions. The seamen belonging to the vessels destined to enjoy the benefits of the treaty are not to penetrate into the interior of the country. Should they contravene this provision, they will be liable to an imprisonment, the length of which shall in every case be fixed by the Emperor, according to the circumstances of the case.

THE "STRAND BUILDINGS" (MODEL LODGING-HOUSE) TO BE ERECTED IN EAGLE-COURT.

THE "STRAND BUILDINGS"

A PHILANTHROPIC effort is now being made to provide the operative classes with a superior description of dwelling at a lower rent than they are accustomed to pay, this new provision being made immediately adjoining the great metropolitan thoroughfare of the Strand. This movement has originated with a committee of noblemen and gentlemen who, under the Labourers' Dwellings Act, 1855, propose to erect a large Model Lodging-house for families, upon a site in Eagle-court Strand, opposite Somerset House.

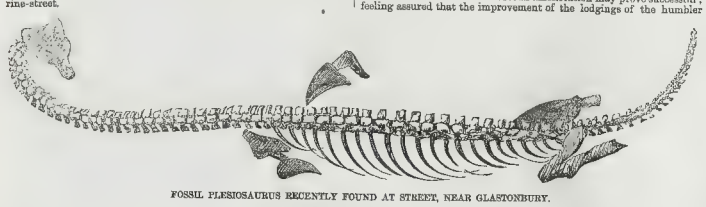
Perhaps no district can be found in this vast metropolis in which the deficiency of healthy habitations for the industrial classes is more apparent, or where the rent paid is higher in proportion to the wretched and inadequate accommodation. Eagle-court is bounded on the north by Little Catherine-street and Drury lane; on the east by Clare-market and its numerous courts and alleys of the most miserable description; on the south by the Strand; and on the west by Catherine-street.

An agreement for lease of the site has been obtained, at the low rent of £50 per annum, from his Grace the Duke of Bedford, for a term of about eighty years, with the power of extending the term and reducing the ground rent to a peppercorn.

It is proposed to erect the buildings (of which the plans have been approved), offering commodious and well-arranged homes for twenty-five families, and combining, under the approval of the Board of Health, every improvement in ventilation, water and gas supply, drainage, and other advantages calculated to improve the sanitary condition of the occupiers.

It is estimated that at moderate rents the annual rental will amount to £500, and that the annual expenditure (allowing a suite of rooms and £25 per annum to the Superintendent) will amount to £150, thus yielding a clear income of £350, or 7 per cent on the gross amount of capital. There is a margin of £500 for advertising, office expenses, and contingencies, over the building outlay.

We trust that this work of social amelioration may prove successful; feeling assured that the improvement of the lodgings of the humbler classes is an object of the utmost importance; whilst the company seek support in confidence that the movement will be in every sense a prosperous one. We are happy to add that the required capital is now half subscribed. Miss Burdett Coutts has signified her intention, conditionally upon the rest of the capital being raised, to subscribe for one hundred shares, and with the interest thereof to endow the church of St. Michael's, Burleigh-street, Strand.



FOSSIL PLESIOSAURUS RECENTLY FOUND AT STREET, NEAR GLASTONBURY.

FOSSIL PLESIOSAURUS,

RECENTLY DISCOVERED AT STREET, NEAR GLASTONBURY.

THE lias quarries of Street, a large village in Somersetshire, are celebrated for their fossil revelations of a remote period of the earth's history. This locality appears to have been the resort of those strange monsters the Saurians, and was probably, at the distant epoch marked by this peculiar development of animal life, an immense lake or muddy lagoon—a supposition favoured by the size and position of the lias strata. The specimen of which the above is a fac-simile, was found in the same quarry which entombed the fine fossil of Ichthyosaurus, lately purchased by his Grace the Duke of Marlborough, engraved in the columns of this journal.

The vertebræ are quite perfect, but the ribs are slightly displaced, as are also the pectoral bones and those of the pelvis. The "paddles" appear to be turned under the body, so that their digits appear on the lower side.

The animal seems to have turned back its singular pointed head in the agony of death; and the skeleton has preserved the last attitude of dissolution through the successive changing phases of the world's existence.

THE GRANITE QUARRIES AT RUBISLAW, NEAR ABERDEEN.

GRANITE PAVEMENT.

THE pavement of London, extending through more than 5000 streets, and exceeding 3000 miles in length, is one of our metropolitan marvels; and we rarely see a street area broken up for repair without being reminded how vast are the operations by which the materials are brought from comparative solitudes to be strewed over the busiest haunt of man. In these materials granite plays the principal part, in spite of the many nostrums which have been tried at various times to supersede it. One of the vast natural dépôts is the granite quarries at Rubislaw (pronounced Robsley), within a mile of Aberdeen, which is mostly built of it, and is hence called "the Granite City."

The area already worked is several acres in extent; and from these quarries is procured the grey granite, called Aberdeen granite, in contradistinction to the Peterhead granite, which is red. After the operation of blasting, represented in one of the annexed sketches, the larger blocks are again split, by means of wedges, which are driven in with forge-like hammers. Several of these wedges are inserted in alike, not only on the upper surface of the block, but down the sides also, and, though splitting a large block is a work of some little time, it is, nevertheless, rapid, considering the substance and the resistance it gives. The smaller blocks are then shaped in the quarry, and afterwards conveyed on board ship at Aberdeen. Large quantities are transported to London and other cities, where it is used for building purposes, or for the construction of macadamised and other roads.

The huts represented in the small Illustration are such as are used by the workmen, and in wet weather are turned down, as there represented. Besides these there are more substantial buildings in the quarries for the accommodation of the hands employed. The larger Illustration gives a good general view of the quarry, and has been selected as one of the principal points at present worked. "The Granite City" is a fine example of the application of this almost indestructible material. Difficult as it is to fashion even into squared blocks, instances are there to be found of its adaptation to Gothic architecture, and to the Corinthian capital, with wonderful success, being a triumph in these modern days exceeding the mighty efforts of the sculptors of Thebes, whose monuments in the same material are imperishable records of the greatness and power of a nation whose work and the difficulties overcome we are too apt to look upon as unequalled in the history of art.

Rubislaw is not the only quarry that granite is taken from, but the town of Aberdeen is built mostly of it. The red granite quarries at Sterlinghill, four miles from Peterhead, on the property of Lord Aberdeen, and the Cairngall granite quarry, four miles on the west of Peterhead. The granite is turned out by blasting, similar to any other rock. There are, perhaps, about 80 to 100 men at each of the quarries, some quarriers getting perhaps, 15s. on an average per week; others more; and there are curb and causeway stone dressers working by the piece who make sometimes 22s. per week. In Aberdeen, at Macdonald's works, dressers get 26s., but only these average elsewhere 23s. to 24s., at building stones We can hardly say the number of tons turned out in a year—some thousands, but not nearly that available for polishing purposes, though it would do well enough for building. Rubislaw quarry is wrought by Messrs. John Gibb and Son, civil engineers, who are engaged in the pavement trade. The others are wrought by Macdonald.

AN EMPRESS COMING OUT.—One day last week, while the Empress was taking a drive with one of her maids of honour, she suddenly asked her whether she knew where the Princess Thurn and Taxis, the widow of the late Grand Master of the Household lived. As the reply was in the affirmative orders were at once given to drive to the Singer Strasse, where the Princess lives, and a visit of condolence was paid by her Majesty which must have been more than a matter of mere form, as it lasted nearly an hour. On Monday, in the evening, the Empress held a cercle, as it is here called, and it was remarked that her Majesty has lost a great deal of that timidity which she displayed before she went to Italy. The same observation was also made the next evening in the apartments of the Archduchess Sophia, where there were private theatricals for the amusement of the full grown guests, and a magic lantern for the edification of the rising generation. For the first time since she has been the consort of the Emperor her Majesty spoke without hesitation to the gentlemen attached to the Court.—Letter from Vienna.

SMUGGLING IN CHINA.—Some correspondence relative to consular interference for the prevention of smuggling in China was presented to the late Parliament a few days before its dissolution. Viscount Palmerston, then Foreign Secretary of State, wrote to Sir G. Bonham in May, 1854 respecting the expediency of devising effectual means for stopping the system of smuggling prevailing in China, and especially at Shanghai. The smuggling appears attributable to the remissness and corruption of the Chinese authorities, and on the twofold ground of a certain clause in the treaty of Hoo-munchae, and of the omission of the China Government itself to act up to the manifest intention of the existing treaties. Lord Palmerston determined to withhold for the future all interference on the part of the British consular authorities for the protection of the Chinese revenue. The Government of her Majesty came to this decision with reluctance; but, as the Chinese authorities would not do their duty in preventing dishonest traders from defrauding the Emperor of his just dues, the British Government could no longer order her Majesty's Consuls to do that for the Emperor which his own servants did not deem it necessary to do.

"KING RICHARD THE SECOND."

The revival of this tragedy at the Princess' has given universal satisfaction, and the whole performance may be safely cited as an exhibition to which no rival in London exists. The drama of no country at present receives such illustration as the Shakspearean in England. Our greatest poet is magnificently attired, whenever and wherever he is introduced to the British stage. Our Illustration this week represents the famous entry of Richard into London—an episode in the great argument which is indebted to Mr. C. Kean for its details, which have been so judiciously selected and so admirably combined. We have already referred our readers to "Strutt's Sports and Pastimes of the English," as the authority for some of the picturesque accessories, such as the Dance of Itinerant Fools, and the antics of mountebanks and acrobats by which it is preceded. The procession is placed on the boards with strict historical accuracy. The City trumpeters, banners, sword-bearers, sheriffs, lord mayor, aldermen, captains, and companies, in armour, with Royal banners, noblemen, and minstrels precede the Duke of Lancaster's banner, and the entry, attended with their knights, of Bolingbroke and the captive King on horseback. The dramatic portion of the scene is verbally derived from "The Chronicle of the Betrayal of King Richard II." It runs as follows:—"The Duke of Lancaster, having been received with shouts of enthusiasm, addressed the multitude in these words:—'Thanks, my countrymen and loving friends; I thank you, countrymen.' Voices from the crowd then answered, 'Long live Henry, the noble Duke of Lancaster! Welcome hongwished-for Duke of Lancaster; may all joy and prosperity attend you! Such a lord deserves to be King.' Bolingbroke then rejoined: 'My Lords and friends, here is King Richard: I deliver him into your custody, and beg you to do with him what you wish.' Whereupon different voices replied, 'God save thee, Bolingbroke! Heaven preserve thee! Welcome, Bolingbroke!'" After all this poor Richard himself appears, and is received by the people with ominous silence. "And as he (continues the Chronicle) rode through London on a little horse, on his way to prison, they kept an open space round him that every one might see him; and there was a boy who pointed him out with his finger, saying, 'Behold King Richard, who has done so much good to the kingdom of England.' It is true that some pitied him much, and others were exceedingly glad, cursing him loudly in their language, and saying, 'Now are we all well revenged of him who has governed us so ill.' And in this manner was he taken to the Tower of London." These details, also, are acted on the scene; to which is added an incident addressed both to the fancy and the feeling. One of the soldiers, who had fought under the banner of Edward the Black Prince, at Cressy and Poitiers, accompanied by his grandson, endeavours to pay homage to the son of his former commander, but is prevented by the mob, and treated with contempt. With this touching situation the spectacle concludes.

THE COURT.

The Queen remains at Buckingham Palace, and continues to take daily carriage airings. Her Majesty's accouchement may be expected to take place within a very early period.

At the Court held on the 20th inst. the following noblemen were appointed Lord Lieutenants:—The Duke of Rutland, of the county of Leicester, the Earl of Burlington, of Lancashire; and Viscount Milton, of the West Riding of Yorkshire.

On Tuesday the Prince Consort and the Prince of Wales honoured the Royal Academy of Music, in Tenterden-street, with a visit In the evening the Queen and the Prince, with the Princess Royal and the Princess Feodore of Hohenlohe-Langenburg, honoured the Haymarket Theatre with their presence

On Wednesday the Queen, accompanied by the Princess of Hohenlohe Langenburg, visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, at Clarence House, St. James's. Prince Albert went to the camp at Aldershott. His Royal Highness travelled by the South-Western Railway to Farnborough, and rode on horseback to the encampment, returning to Buckingham Palace shortly before two o'clock. During the afternoon the Queen received a visit from the Duke and Duchess de Nemours

His Excellency the Belgian Minister and Madame Van de Weyer will give a grand dinner this evening (Saturday) to their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary.

Viscount Palmerston left Cambridge House on Thursday morning to make an electioneering visit to Tiverton. He Ladyship accompanied the Premier. The noble Viscount and Viscountess will return to town on Saturday

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

THE week's transactions in Home Stocks, both for money and time have been very limited; nevertheless, prices generally have continued steady. The Discount Market, though not to say excited, has ruled firm, and full rates have been realised; those on the Stock Exchange, for short paper, being 6 to 6½; in Lombard-street, 5½ to 6 per cent. whilst some of the discount-houses are taking money on "call" at from 6½ to 8 per cent

Our advices from the Continent are to the effect that money is becoming easier, notwithstanding that the supply has not increased. The Bank of Amsterdam has lowered its rate to four, and at Hamburg the value of money is five per cent. This decline may have the effect of drawing capital to this country for discount purposes

About £ 600 in gold has been withdrawn from the Bank of England this week for transmission to the Continent, and the value of the imports, which have not exceeded £150,000, have been sold for France. The Silver Market has been rather active; and, to meet heavy shipments to be made to India next week, £120,000 in silver has come to hand from France and Belgium. As numerous contracts have been entered into to furnish silver, the drain upon Continental resources will be heavy for some time. Here scarcely any supply is in the market

Mr. Escalle, late Governor of the Royal British Bank, has been again examined in the Court of Bankruptcy. No new facts have been elicited; but we understand that another dividend will be shortly declared.

A meeting of the shareholders of the London and Eastern Banking Corporation has been held, at which it was admitted that, out of the paid up capital of £250,000, no more than £27,200 was lent on mortgage to one of the directors at 10 per cent! The total liabilities are £320,734. It has been arranged that the business of the bank shall in future be carried on by other institutions in India, on condition that the shareholders give their notes-of-hand for the whole of the unpaid-up capital.

Much satisfaction has been expressed at the appearance of an official notice stating that the Sound Dues question has been finally settled.

On Monday Consols were rather inactive. The Three per Cents, for Money, were done at 93¾ ¾; for the Account, 93¾ ¾; India stock realised 221¾ to 223½; and Bank Stock, for Account, 220½. Exchequer Bills were 7s. 4ds. to 3s. prem.; Exchequer Bonds, 96¾ and 98¾. Tuesday's business was limited, as follows:—Three per Cent Consols, for Money, 93¾ ¾; Ditto, for Account, 93¾ ½; New Two and-a-Half per Cents, 76¾; Exchequer Bills, 3s. 4ds. 2s. prem. Scarcely any change took place in the quotations on Wednesday, the Three per Cents, for Money, being done at 93¾ ¾; for Account, 93¾ to 93½. India Bonds were 5s. dis.; Exchequer Bills, 3s. dis. to 3s. prem.; and the Bonds, 98¾ to 99¾ ¾. There was rather more firmness in the Stock Market on Thursday, and an upward tendency:—The Three per Cents, for Transfer, were done at 93¾ ¾ to ¾; for the Account, 93¾ ¾. Exchequer Bills were rather firmer, at 1s. dis. to 1s. prem. India Stock ¾ ¾. He Directors of the Bank of England made no change in the minimum rate of discount

The dealings in the Foreign House have not been of a specu'ative character, and the purchases for money have been rather restricted. The changes in the quotations, however, have been unimportant. Brazilian Four-and-a-Half per Cents have realised 89½. Brazilian Five per Cents, 1024; Ditto, Six per Cents, 1004; Mexican Three per Cents, 24¾; Peruvian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 77¾; Portuguese Three p r Cents, 45; Russian Four-and-a Half per Cents, 99¼; Ditto, Five per Cents, 107; Turkish Six per Cents, 89¾; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 63; Dutch Four per Cents, 89; Spanish Three per Cents, 41½; Spanish New Deferred, 22½; Sardinian Five per Cents, 89¾ to 91; Austrian Four per Cents

Joint-stock Bank Shares, generally, have continued firm in price Australian have realised 84; Bank of Egypt, 18; City, 70; English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered, 42; Limited Chartered of London, 7¾; London and Country, 32⅞; London Joint-Stock, 31; Oriental, 40; Ottoman, 16⅞; Union of Australia, 55⅞; Union of London, 26; and Western Bank of London, 40

Miscellaneous Securities have been dull, yet we have no material change to report in prices. ## THE MARKETS.

CORN.—THURSDAY (Friday).—Notwithstanding that we had a very limited supply of English wheat in our market to-day, the demand for all kinds ruled exceedingly heavy, at barely Monday's decline in the quotations. The general quality of the samples was by no means good. The fresh imports of foreign wheat have been limited; yet the show of samples, ex granary, was good. So few transactions took place that prices were almost nominal. In floating cargoes of grain very little was passing. Barley was in fair supply and sluggish request, but not cheaper. There was a fair demand for malt, at full prices. Oats, beans, and peas changed hands slowly, at Monday's fall in value. The flour trade was very dull

Arrivals this week.—English: wheat, 1670 quarters; barley, 450; malt, 1570; flour, 1360. Irish: Oats, 3000. Foreign: wheat, 1770; barley, 9700; oats, 510; flour, 310 sacks

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 49s. to 50s.; ditto, white, 50s. to 56s.; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 46s. to 49s.; rye, 36s. to 38s.; grinding barley, 30s. to 32s.; distilling ditto, 35s to 38s.; malting ditto, 39s. to 43s.; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 68s. to 70s.; brown ditto, 63s. to 65s.; Kingston and Ware, 70s. to 73s.; Chevalier, 72s. to 73s.; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 23s. to 25s.; potato ditto, 24s. to 31s.; Youghal and Cork, black, 23s. to 24s.; ditto, white, 24s to 29s.; tick beans, 33s. to 34s.; grey peas, 37s. to 38s.; maple, 39s to 40s.; white, 36s to 40s.; boilers, 39s. to 42s. per quarter. Seeds.—Linseed is still dull, and rather drooping. In rape very little is doing, and clover-seed is rather cheaper Cakes are dull

Linseed, English crushy, 21s. to 22s.; Mediterranean and Odessa, 20s. to 22s.; bompool, 23s. to 24s. per quarter Coriander, 20s. to 24s. per cwt. Liverpool.—A very limited business is doing in all kinds, yet we have no change to notice in the quotations. Common sound Congous is held at 12½d. to 13d. per lb. The imports are extensive, and the warehousing business is increasing

Sugar.—For good and fine raw sugars the trade has been a moderate inquiry, at last week's prices, but free qualities have sold heavily, and the quotations have ruled somewhat in favour of buyers. Demerara has realised 45s. 3d. to 45s. 6d.; Saturnia, 44s. to 47s. 6d.; and Madras, 42s. 6d. to 45s. 6d. per cwt. The refined market is quiet at late rates, viz., 62s 6d to 67s per cwt

Tallow.—P.Y.C., on the spot, has been held for the present month's delivery at 57s 1½d. and even 58s per cwt. Town tallow, however, is freely offered at 57s 6d per cwt. The business doing is limited

Oils.—Linseed oil has sold slowly at 27?. 10s. to 28?. per ton, on the spot Rape is quiet at £54 to £54 10s for refined, and £51 for brown. Other oils are dull. Turpentine is rather spirits, 40s. to 41s 6d.; rosin, 10s 6d per cwt

Sperm.—Rum is in limited request, and rather dearer. Good to fair Demerara has realised 2s. 10d. to 2s. 11d.; and brood Bahian, 2s 10d. per gallon. There is much firmness in the brandy market, and the finest parcels are worth 10s 6d per gallon. No change in cura çoa wines

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £3 10s. to £4 0s.; clover ditto, £3 3s. to £5 0s.; and straw, £1 6s. to £1 10s per load

Potatoes.—The supplies are moderate, and the demand is inactive, at from 60s. to 180s. per ton

Hops.—[illegible] are quite as much as the present request, and prices are well supported In all old or kinds very little is doing at late rates. The imports of foreign bags continue Mid and East Kent pockets, £3 15s. to £5 5s.; Weald of Kent, £3 5s. to £5 0s.; Sussex, £2 2s to £4 5s per cwt.

Metropolitan Cattle Market (Friday).—The supply of beasts in to-day's market was very moderate in number, but fine in quality. For most breeds we had a fair demand, at Monday's currency. Sheep, the sales of which was limited, moved off slowly, yet prices were supported. There was very little doing in calves. Pigs, 4s. 4d. to 5s. 4d.; prime small ditto, 5s. 6d. to 6s. 2d.; and small porkers, 6s. 4d. to 6s. 8d. per 8lb. Suckling calves, 23s. to 28s.; quarter-old store pigs, 21s. to 28s. each. this name in the sober negative character of their colouring.

"A Mountain Mirror" (70), by Mr. Pettit, looks at first sight spotty and wanting in breadth; but this is due to the nature of the scenery, which consists of nothing but bare masses of rock, crags, and boulders—all repeated in the faithful lake. The colouring, from the nature of the view, is rather repulsive; but evinces keen perception of the various gradations and hues of grey, slate, purple, blue, dun, and cinnamon.

There is honest imitation of nature in "Coast Scene, Isle of Arran" (128), by Mr. Peel. The sunny effect and the golden cornfield are particularly happy.

The great trough and sweep of the valley is well realised in No. 141, by Mr. Bridell, and it is altogether a pleasing picture; but it seems rather more like a reminiscence of a Turneresque vision of "Lake Avernus" than an actual locality in the Tyrol.

"A Salmon-trap — Evening" (262), by Mr. Oakes, is in its sky tints not so happy as a picture by this artist we recently noticed at the Exhibition of the British Institution, but the whole of the landscape is kept down with scientific knowledge of effect.

Three small views of towns in France (270-1-2), by Mr. Wood, deserve particular attention. The firmness and power of the painting are very promising.

"A By-way among the Hills" (51), by Mr. Hulme, is full of the charming vivacity of chequered sunlight straggling through trees.

No. 39, by Mr. Robins, is very natural and modest. The "chopping" waves are especially truthful, and we think the picture affords the best specimen of seapainting in the rooms.

Great luminosity and power characterise the pictures by Mr. Raven, and there is, sometimes, a kind of Giorgionesque effect about the lighting of the clouds. But this strength is not only lavished sometimes, but the "modesty of nature is o erstepped," and startling effects given where they could not occur. These remarks are made generally, but they apply to "The Funeral of a Village Maiden" (258) executed, however, in conjunction with Mr. C. J. Lewis. "The Merry Merry Month of May" (246), another work by Mr. Raven, is extremely vivid and positive in colour, with a certain garishness beyond nature.

There are landscapes by Mr. Montague and a few other artists, the consideration of which our limits compel us to forego. We may say, however, in conclusion, that in our notice of this Exhibition we have pointed out all those pictures which arrested our attention by any kind of excellence, and that we have dwelt more upon their merits than their occasional defects. To have marked all the feebleness and enumerated all the failures in these rooms would have been indeed a long and unthankful task.

We this week engrave, agreeably to promise, Mr. Moore's careful and truthful picture, "Haymaking in Switzerland, Lausanne. Painted on the spot" (66). The artist surely needs not tell us his picture was "painted on the spot" — the fact is sufficiently apparent. Some of our more unsuspecting readers may, however, be surprised that such a statement is made at all. Alas! they little know the occult mysteries of manufacture and transmutation going on in many a dark studio. But, confining ourselves to the simplicity and faithfulness of the work before us, what can be more true to nature than those sturdy oxen standing in the sunshine, with their drooping white eyelashes, and the shadows from their ears and horns creeping along their rough and shaggy sides? Why, laziness and good living on such rich, fragrant, flowery provender as that before them are marked in every trait of their condition. They are so perfectly painted as to form unquestionably the great attraction of the picture; and the haymakers, having not much nationally interesting about them, are somewhat like the actors at Astley's — human supernumeraries. The woman, however, is rather droll, in virtue of her dowdy straw hat. Agriculturists will, no doubt, find some amusement, not merely in the uneconomical employment of a yoke of oxen to so small a load, but in the primeval simplicity of the method by which they are attached to the cart, and likewise in the primitive lumbering form of the cart itself. The models of the whole have been, if not of antediluvian, certainly of fabulous, antiquity. The picture contains little to remind us of "Lausanne," more than the fertile and beautiful plain of the Pays de Vaud, and some alps in the distance; but we cannot say whether these are the Alps of Savoy, Vaud, the Vallais, or Fribourg—they cannot be the distant mountains of Jura. We get no glimpse of the classic Leman, nor of the beautifully-situated town of Lausanne itself; the mention of which recals so many recollections of Gibbon, Voltaire, Rousseau, Byron, John Philip Kemble and a host of other associations.

INAUGURATION OF MR. BUCHANAN, AS PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, AT WASHINGTON.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY WHITCHURCH, OF WASHINGTON.

INAUGURATION OF MR. BUCHANAN AS PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

THIS simple ceremony took place at Washington, on the 4th inst. The morning was welcomed with the firing of cannon and ringing of bells; from nearly every prominent point, and from many private residences, the national flag floated gracefully in the breeze. The streets and avenues began early to fill with a busy crowd of citizens, as well as the thousands of strangers and countrymen who for the previous days had poured towards the national metropolis in one uninterupted stream. The city of Washington was probably never before visited by so large a number of persons, without reference to party distinction.

At about ten o'clock the procession began to form in New York-avenue and Fifteenth-street, as follows:—W. Selden, Esq., Marshal-in-Chief, accompanied by his aids: they wore yellow scarfs with white rosettes; and the saddle-cloths of their horses were blue and gold.

The military escort was headed by General John A. Quitnam, mounted on a fine charger, and accompanied by his aids. Next came the Flying Artillery Company, from Fort McHenry, in full uniform, mounted, with four officers and sixty-two men, four pieces of artillery, and caissons. They attracted a large share of the public attention. They were followed by the President's mounted guard, Capt. Polk, a full marine band of music; the battalion of United States' Marines, four companies; Washington Light Infantry, National Greys, National Guards, Highlanders, Union Guard, Washington Jagers, Boone Rifles, and American Rifles.

Next came Dodworth's celebrated brass band from New York; then the Albany Bi[illegible] Corps on the right, and the Willard Guards and the Charlestown City Guards on the left. Then Scott's band of music, from Rochester, New York; and also the Salem brass band. The Young Guard from Richmond, with their splendid band The Lancaster Fencibles, Philadelphia, the Mount Vernon Guards, Alexandria Rifles, the Albany band of music, the Montgomery Guards, the Alleghany Guards, and the Continentals of Cumberland, accompanied by many staff officers. "Some of the companies," (says the Times correspondent) "were in excellent order, their uniforms clean and bright, and their drill good; in many their condition of the utmost precision, as regards the outward appearance of the soldier. Those brilliant companies were evidently well to do, and could afford to expend something for the credit of the corps. But there were other detachments so oddly threadbare and dilapidated, that if their patriotism had not exceeded their vanity they would surely have remained at home. The most striking of all the military companies was one in the uniform of the 'Continentals' of 1776—blue with buff facings. The colours still bore on a party badge in the cover of the Edinburgh Review—the Union Jack and topboots. It is very nearly the dress military critics of Napoleon in his early campaigns. Compared with more modern military tailoring it loses very little. The hat would certainly catch rain like a dish but would pour it off clear of the collar; the stock conducts it down the neck The boots look better than any form of the trousers. On the whole, as a fighting and marching dress, it was quite as good as most of our present uniforms. The officers add an elaborate lace shirt-frill, which throws in a touch of the drawing room. The "Tom-Jo's" were quite a feature of the day. Another relic of the past turned up among the crowd—an old gentlemen wore a real queue, a veritable pigtail, carefully trimmed and tied: in the New World one ancient fashion still survives.

At the head of the civic part of the procession was a car, with a splendid national flag floating from a pole from seventy to eighty feet high, surmounted with a "cap of liberty." This flag was richly decorated with allegorical representations, as Civilisation, Agriculture, Mechanics, and Fine Arts. On one side was the God of War, on the other the Goddess of Liberty. The car was drawn by six handsomely-caparisoned horses, attended by grooms The workmen of the Washington Navy-yard, under the command of Captain J. Rainbow, deserve great credit for this contribution

This flag was followed by the President of the United States, Franklin Pierce, with James Buchanan, President elect, attended by Marshals and Assistant Marshals.

The ship Constitution, built and fitted out at the Washington Navy-yard, next advanced in fine style—a perfect specimen of naval architecture in proportions, build, rigging, and spars a complete man of war in all but armament. She was decorated with flags, and "manned" by ten lads attired in full sailors' costume.

The remainder of the procession consisted of persons on horseback and in vehicles.

The Senate Chamber, immediately after Congress had adjourned, was opened for the admission of Senators, the privileged guests, ex-President and Vice President, the Judges of the Supreme Court (who were in black silk gowns), diplomatic corps, heads of departments, and members of Congress; officers of the Army and Navy who by name had received the thanks of Congress, Governors of States, and various officials connected with Government, besides the local authorities of the district of Columbia, &c.

The procession having arrived, the President and President elect, accompanied by the Committee of Arrangement, proceeded to the Vice President's room; and, on the new Senate being called to order, the President and President elect were introduced by the Committee of Arrangement to the seats prepared for them in front of the Secretary's table in the Senate Chamber, with the Judges on the right and the diplomatic corps on the left. The whole body then proceeded to the entrance portico, where the President took his seat in front of the platform. The attendance of political associations, judicial persons, clergy, members of Congress, Governors of States and Territories, members of the Cabinet and Legislature, officers of the army and navy, and military, corporate authorities, and other dignitaries, formed an immense concourse, extending a considerable distance in every direction. As soon as order could be restored, Mr. Buchanan rose, and in a clear and strong voice delivered the inaugural address. The President's remarks were frequently interrupted by hearty applause; and on its conclusion chear after cheer greeted the speaker.

The oath of office was administered by the venerable Chief Justice; after which the members of the Senate, preceded by the Vice-President, Secretary, and Sergeant-at-Arms, returned to the Senate Chamber; and the President, accompanied by the Committee of Arrangement, proceeded to the President's house.

The entire military, after the inauguration, escorted President Buchanan to the White House, where they formed in line, and passed in review before him.

During the afternoon thousands of citizens and strangers crowded to the executive mansion to pay their respects to Mr. Buchanan.

The accompanying view of the platform in front of the portico of the Capitol at Washington has been engraved from a photograph by Whitechurch, of Washington.

THE LARGO MERCATELLO, NAPLES, ILLUMINATED.

We engrave this scene as a specimen of the spontaneous rejoicings of the Neapolitan people; and also as an artistic curiosity. The official journal of the 26th ult. announced that "to-day, at two o'clock, the joyful salvos of all the castles gave intelligence of the most happy delivery of her augast Majesty our Queen, who, in the Palace of Caserta, has given birth to a well-formed Prince. This most cheering news was rapidly spread about, exciting in every direction the most lively exultation."

Assuming to be the just interpreters of the overflowing joy of a happy and grateful people, the municipality erected in the Largo Mercatello the temporary edifice which forms the subject of the accompanying Sketch: it was covered with white and crimson hangings. In the centre was a colossal transparency of the Madonna, clothed with a large mantle, beneath and within whose ample folds their Majesties were enveloped. Around them were shields bearing the names of the various members of the Royal Family. Immediately above were the family shields, surmounted by an allegorical figure, explaining the origin of the great happiness and prosperity of the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, and the ground on which King Ferdinand bases all his hopes. On each side of the erection was a scaffolding whereon was seated a band of instrumental performers; and the whole was brilliantly illuminated with lamps of all kinds. The occasion of the fête was so important, and the joy of the Neapolitans thereat was considered to be so exuberant, that the authorities ordered three evenings to be given up to festivities. Besides a considerable number of people on foot and in carriages, a syndron of cavalry and innumerable bodies of police assisted. The evening passed over with the greatest tranquillity.

The site which was chosen for this grand display has presented within the last nine years some striking contrasts. Here is the entrance to the Jesuits' College, and those who were in Naples in March, 1848, will not soon forget how on a cold, drizzly morning some thousands of people occupied the open space in front, and howled like wild beasts for their prey. Later in the day the members of the Society of Jesus issued forth in carriages in procession, imposing by the dignity of their bearing on the imagination of the multitude, and, driving to the Arsenal, were sent off by sea. In 1857 the entrance to the building is illuminated: they are again in places of power and trust—for the King has need of them.

THE HOUSELESS AND VAGRANT POOR.—Mr. J. W. Butterworth, of Fleet-street, a guardian of the West London Union, has addressed a letter to the Lord Mayor, on the vast variety inscribable to personal influence to place the legal relief of the houseless poor of London on a better footing. His plan is simply this: that each metropolitan union or poor-board shall contribute an annual quota, to be determined according to the aggregate of its rateable value or average annual expenditure, to a common fund, to be applied to the erection and maintenance of a proper number of conveniently-situated and uniformly-conducted casual wards throughout the metropolis. This, if carried out, would at once remove the motive, and therefore put an end to the system at present pursued by different boards of rendering their casual wards inaccessible to the wandering and peculiar class of paupers for whom they are maintained, in order to shift on other shoulders the burden of the rate for their support.

A man, pretending to be deaf and dumb, was begging in Stockton a few days ago. At one house where he solicited alms, a fine Newfound land dog sprang out at him, when the fellow exclaimed in an excited manner, "If you don't take the dog away I'll stick him

CITY BANQUET TO LORD PALMERSTON.

On Friday evening week the Lord Mayor entertained Lord Palmerston, the Cabinet, the subordinate Ministers and officials, and a numerous party of guests, principally selected for their conformity in politics with the present Administration, in the Egyptian Hall, at the Mansion-house. There were covers laid for 360 guests. As far as the press arrangements were concerned, they were very restricted. The company included his Excellency Feroux Khan (the Persian Plenipotentiary) and suite, who have just arrived in London, and whose Oriental aspect and picturesque appointments made them objects of peculiar interest. The usual loyal toasts were disposed of with the customary honours. In reply to the toast of "The Army," Gen. Codrington returned thanks.

To the toast of "The Navy,"

Sir C. Wood responded. He would not (he said) refer to the war, but would speak of the services rendered to the country in a time of peace. In the midst of the present Government, the honour of England had been sullied, or that her dignity or position had been lowered. They had been told that their foreign policy was turbulent, aggressive, and braggadocio. Now, although it might be difficult to prove a negative, he asked, was their turbulence to be inferred from their extreme reluctance to go to war, or from their having signed two treaties of peace within twelve months? Was their aggressive character shown in their steady refusal of all territorial aggrandisement? And he appealed to the diplomatic correspondence of the last four years to prove whether or not there had been any tendency to braggadocia on the part of the Government (Hear). He was not going to travel over the map of Europe, but would say one word about the United States, whose present Government entertained, he believed, the best disposition towards this country. They had the advantage of having at the head of the United States' Government that eminent man with whom he had long in this country, who had mixed amongst all classes, and had been able to ascertain for himself what were the real feelings of this country. With respect to China the Government had only done what they felt their honour would have done protect the honour of the British flag He believed Admiral Seymour to have been fully justified; and Sir J. Bowring, who had been opposed to every sort of vituperation, had been most unjustly attacked. He believed that Admiral Seymour would, like an honourable man, bear the full responsibility of Sir J. Bowring (Cheers)—and that both would have been condemned by their countrymen had they not protected the honour of our flag and the interests of our commerce (Cheers)

To the toast of "The House of Commons,"

Mr. G. Grey returned thanks; and, after some further speeches, the company separated about twelve o'clock

THE BEST USE FOR SMITHFIELD MARKET.

THE last number of the Labourer's Friend, the journal of the Society for improving the condition of the Labouring Classes, contains an interesting correspondence between Sir C. Trevelyan, and Sir S. M. Peto, regarding the best use to which the site of Smithfield Market can be turned. It appears that the Commissioners to whom the best mode of disposing of that valuable space of ground had been confided, requested Sir Charles Trevelyan to give them a general idea of the manner in which the site might be laid out for the promotion of the public health and recreation, without any considerable extent, the cause of intellectual, moral and religious improvement. "The whole area," as Sir Charles states, "is six acres, but its shape is so irregular that, in order to make it fully available, it must either be consolidated by purchases or exchanges, or some special use must be made of the parts which are thrown off from the main body. It may, I suppose, be assumed that the bulk and entire centre of the area will be railed off and planted with trees and shrubs, which should be constantly renewed. And round each of the lesser portion of the site, and the lofty ranges of Model Lodging Houses might be erected, in substitution for some of the miserable accommodation of the neighbouring population, and as an example for more extensive constructions of the same kind elsewhere. And in some suitable situation, I should like to see one of the bays or irregular indentations of the general area, I would suggest that a building should be constructed on the Crystal Palace principle, which might combine the following objects:—1st. The means of public recreation, according to the 'Public Recreation Society' of Birmingham. 2ndly. The means of intellectual improvement by a library, philosophical apparatus, lectures, and the other arrangements usually adopted in Mechanics' Institutes; and, 3rdly. The means of religious quiet and reading on Sunday to those who desire it."

Sir Morton Peto agrees with Sir Charles that the site should be devoted to the promotion of the health and enjoyment of the citizens of London, and for this end he suggests that the greater portion of it should be kept as open space, railing in a thoroughfare round it. On the space adjoining Long-lane, used as a pig-market, and up to the end of Long-lane, he would recommend the erection of houses for the industrial classes. He does not propose that the Government should undertake these, but merely that it should give the land for building, at a small ground-rent, on condition that the rents, regulations, &c., are approved by them, as well as the plans and buildings. If these were erected on the plan of flats, with open galleries and public yards, a large amount of accommodation would be obtained, and, let in rooms of two and three to a family, at a moderate rent, would at the same time, have regard to the moderate ground-rent, pay the party investing a remunerative return

From the angle of Long-lane, to the street leading to Holborn, and immediately opposite to Long-lane, there is a long parallelogram, intersected by a thoroughfare called Cock-and-Bell-lane. This would give two spaces—one upon which Sir Morton Peto suggests that baths and washhouses should be erected, and upon the other a library and reading-rooms forming a large establishment, in which, under proper regulations, certificated industrious men should be admitted, on payment of a small subscription, to the library and rooms supplied with all the useful and interesting literature of the day, as well as newspapers and periodicals; in part of the establishment coffee and suitable refreshments to be supplied at fixed prices.

The whole of the space, excepting the small part already described, he would keep open, with iron railings around it, giving it a wide space next the houses, and planted round the whole space with the finest plane-tree. The whole of the interior space to be laid out, first with walks around the outer circle; then the interior space to be gravelled, rolled perfectly smooth, as the walks in Kensington gardens, and kept scrupulously clean, &c. In this part, under proper regulations, he would suggest that athletic games should be permitted. this would not be an annoyance to the inhabitants, and would be felt a great boon in suitable weather and under proper regulations. Both men and lads would find their health and comfort greatly promoted; and with the season of the year, or hour of the day, when they could not enjoy their games, the reading-rooms, &c., would be more attractive

DR. LEITCHARDT.—The object of the communication read by Mr. Sidney to the Geographical Society on Monday, on a proposed expedition in South Australia in search of the missing Dr. Leitchardt and his party was to prove that Dr. Leitchardt is still living in the interior, and that by a well-directed search, conducted in a fitting manner, he may be discovered and restored to his friends, or at all events, that his papers may be obtained, even if he should be dead. It is proposed that the expedition should consist of about fifteen native troopers, each with a packhorse loaded with essential requisites, and that they should, thus unencumbered, make a rapid journey in the direction where Dr. Leitchardt was last heard of It was stated that a number of cattle he took with him would be sure to have left tracks in the bush which could be easily traced. The writer of the paper who had had fourteen years' experience in the wilds of South Australia, is of opinion that the blacks in the interior would not maltreat the European traveller; but would be more likely to detain him among them The expense of such an expedition was estimated at £[illegible]

DENMARK AND THE DUCHIES.—The following despatch has been published at Paris, dated Berlin, 22nd inst.:—"Prussia refuses to refer the decision of the question of the Danish Duchies to the Western Powers, as desired by France and England, on the ground of its being a purely German question. It is thought that Austria will also refuse."

Count Persigny returned thanks for the Foreign Ministers.

Lord Granville, in reply to the toast "the House of Peers," having thanked the Lord Mayor for his invitation and his excellent dinner, said that he had lately seen advertised a sauce of peculiar zest which was called Palmerston sauce (A laugh), and he believed that the Lord Mayor had added to the attractions of his dinner by giving them that sauce in the greatest perfection (Laughter). On a very recent occasion the House of Lords had come to a decision opposed to that of the House of Commons, and he confidently believed that ultimately the Lords would prove to have been the best exponents of the will of the people of England (Hear, hear). Earl Granville then went on with thirty-six good reasons for the course they had taken, and would, he believed, on every occasion of emergency give the people reason for exclaiming, "Thank God, we have a House of Lords!" (Cheers)

The Earl of Clarendon, in returning thanks for the toast coupled with his name, said he was most grateful to the Lord Mayor for identifying his name with the permanence of foreign relations, the importance of which it was impossible to over-estimate. The office he had the honour to hold was one of great responsibility; but the people of England had a perfect right to inquire whether in that office he upheld the dignity of the country abroad, or whether he had done anything to weaken the esteem of friends, or to arouse the anger of foes (Hear). The principle upon which the policy of the Government had been guided avoided both extremes, but would say one word about the United States, whose present Government entertained, he believed, the best disposition towards this country. They had the advantage of having at the head of the United States' Government that eminent man with whom he had long in this country, who had mixed amongst all classes, and had been able to ascertain for himself what were the real feelings of this country. With respect to China the Government had only done what they felt their honour would have done protect the honour of the British flag He believed Admiral Seymour to have been fully justified; and Sir J. ## PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Saturday.

The House of Lords met at two o'clock, for the purpose of giving the Royal assent (by commission) to several public bills, and for proroguing Parliament. The Lords Commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, Earl Granville, the Earl of Harrowby, the Marquis of Breadalbane, and Lord Stanley of Alderley. The number of Peers in attendance was very small, including, in addition to the Commissioners, Lord Panmure, the Bishop of London, Lord Wensleydale, Lord Redesdale, and a few others. There was a considerable attendance of ladies, who filled the Opposition benches, and Feroze Khan and the members of his suite, in the picturesque dress of the Persians, occupied a portion of the Episcopal benches. Sir Augustus Clifford proceeded to summon the Commons to attend the House of Peers; and the Speaker, shortly after, accompanied by Lord Palmerston, and about sixty or seventy members of the House of Commons, attended at the bar. The Clerk at the Table read the Commission empowering the Royal assent to be given to the following bills:—Mr. Speaker's Retirement Bill, the Exchequer Bills (£21,049,700) Bill, Commissioners of Supply (Scotland) Bill, the Income-tax Bill, the Indemnity Bill, the Copyhold Enclosure Bill, the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Bill, the Customs-duties Bill, the Mutiny Bill, the Marine Mutiny Bill, &c. The reading of the document having been concluded,

The Lord Chancellor said: In obedience to her Majesty's commands, we do declare to you, the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled, that her Majesty has given her Royal assent to these bills, and require the clerk to pass the same in the usual form and words. The titles of the money bills were first read, and the clerk in the usual Norman French declared that the Queen thanked the Commons and accepted their benevolence; the bills not giving public money were assented to in the briefer and less grateful phrase of "La Reine le veut."

The Lord Chancellor then read the Speech from her Majesty, of which the following is a copy:—

My Lords and Gentlemen,

We are commanded by her Majesty to inform you that, in releasing you at this early period from your attendance in Parliament, it is her Majesty's intention immediately to dissolve the present Parliament, in order to ascertain in the most constitutional manner the sense of her people upon the present state of public affairs.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

We are commanded by her Majesty to thank you for the liberal provision which you have made for the exigencies of the public service during the period that will elapse before the new Parliament, which her Majesty will direct immediately to be called, shall have been able to give its deliberation to these matters.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

We are commanded by her Majesty to express the satisfaction which she feels at your having been able during the present Session materially to reduce the burdens of her people.

Her Majesty commands us to assure you that it is her fervent prayer that the several constituencies of the United Kingdom upon whom will devolve the exercise of those high functions which, by the Constitution, belong to them, may be guided by an all-wise Providence to the selection of representatives whose wisdom and patriotism may aid her Majesty in constant endeavours to maintain the honour and dignity of her crown, and to promote the welfare and happiness of her people.

Then followed the reading of the Act of Prorogation, which, after reciting the names of the "dear cousins," and "well beloved," and "right trusty" of the commissioners, proceeded to say "that for certain pressing causes and considerations, us especially moving, we have thought fit to prorogue our said Parliament; therefore we, confiding very much in your fidelity and circumspection, have given power to you, by virtue of these presents, further to prorogue and continue our present Parliament, in the city of Westminster, from Saturday, the 21st of March, till and unto Thursday, the 30th of April now next following." The Lord Chancellor then declared the Parliament prorogued until Thursday, the 30th of April next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Saturday.

The House met at half-past one. Mr. O'Donoghue took the oaths and his seat for Tipperary, in place of Mr. James Sadleir, expelled.

Renewal of Diplomatic Relations with Naples.—Mr. T. Duncombe inquired whether, since the withdrawal of the French and British Legations from Naples, any overtures had been made by the King of Naples to France and England for the return of those Legations, and whether those overtures were likely to be acceptable to the two countries; as it appeared, according to a statement in one of the public journals, that an Envoy had gone to Paris with the view of settling, in a satisfactory manner, the differences which existed between the Neapolitan Government and the Governments of England and France.—Lord Palmerston. No overtures, properly so called, have been received by the French or English Governments from the King of Naples since the discontinuance of our relations with that Government. But an indirect intimation has reached us to the effect that the Neapolitan Government wishes to know whether, if the King of Naples were to carry into execution a convention made with the Argentine Confederation, by which the political prisoners now detained in the prisons of Naples were to be banished to the territory of the Argentine Confederation, that would be considered by the two Governments as a substantial conclusion of that more moderate system of government which we wish to see established at Naples. I speak only of the British Government; but we do not think that clearing the prisons of Naples by sending the prisoners into banishment to South America, for the purpose of replenishing those prisons by fresh arrests, would be that sort of change of system which would be considered by us as accomplishing the purpose for which diplomatic relations were broken off with the Government of Naples (Hear, hear).

Treaty with the Emperor of Morocco.—Mr. W. Patten inquired if it was true that a treaty had been concluded with the Emperor of Morocco, by which considerable advantages were secured to British subjects?—Lord Palmerston said he would give his answer at the bar, to which he proceeded at once, and brought up the copy of a treaty concluded between her Majesty and the Emperor of Morocco, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Sir A. Clifford, Usher of the Black Rod, a few minutes after two, summoned the House to the House of Lords, to hear her Majesty's message for the prorogation of Parliament read by the Royal Commissioners. The Speaker, accompanied by most of the members present, then quitted the House, returning at half-past two; when the Speaker, standing at the table, read the Royal Speech, and the House broke up, every member in succession first shaking hands with the Speaker.

An Alarming Decision on Slavery.—The most important decision ever made by the Supreme Court of the United States was pronounced recently, and a summary of its leading points will be found among our telegraphic despatches. That supreme tribunal of the land decides that the ordinance of 1787, so far as it prohibits slavery from the north-west territory, was unconstitutional; that the Missouri Compromise, so far as it excluded slavery from the Louisiana territory north of 36 deg. 30 min., was unconstitutional; that Congress had no power to prohibit slavery from any portion of the federal territory, nor to authorise the inhabitants thereof to do so; that negroes are not citizens of the United States; and that the residence of a slave in a free State does not affect his legal condition upon his return to a State where slavery is allowed by law. Thus, at one blow, all the legislation of the country, from the formation of the Constitution to the present day, against the extension of slavery, is swept away; and the Supreme Court decides that the Constitution ex proprio vigore carries slavery into every portion of the federal territory, or, what amounts to the same thing, authorises the slaveholder to carry it thither, in spite of Congress or the will of its inhabitants. The power of Congress over the subject, and the modern doctrine of popular sovereignty in the territories, are alike repudiated and annulled. It is not in the power either of the Federal Government or of the federal territories to exclude slavery therefrom. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of this decision. It gives the sanction of constitutional law to the practical revolution which for some years past has been going on in the policy of the Government upon this subject, and engrafts upon the theory of the republic the doctrines upon which Mr. Calhoun laboured in vain, during the last years of his life, to rally even the people of the Southern States. But one more decision is needed to make slavery the actual law of the whole Republic, and render its prohibition in any of the States null and void; and this we shall probably have when the Lemmon case reaches the same tribunal which has just reversed the whole policy of the Government in regard to the territories. No popular revolution will follow this decision, starting as it will be to the opinions and principles of nine-tenths of the people of the United States. It will be accepted as the authoritative exposition of the Constitution, and regarded by all departments of the Government and by the people as the law of the land. No issue will probably ever be made upon it before the people for the practical settlement of the question will anticipate any political result that might be reached; but it will profoundly affect the public mind in regard to the general question of slavery, and will change the issues which must inevitably come up sooner or later in reference to it. That it will render them less absorbing in their nature, less disturbing in their progress, or more safe and peaceful in their results, no one who knows anything of the temper of the American people can for a moment believe.—New York Times.

THE TOP SAWYER,

AND

HOW HE VOTED.

I.

No! No! Master Dodge,
You're a clever lawyer,
But I'm not your man—
I'm my own Top Sawyer.
I've a loving wife;
I've a son and daughter;
I've a ten pound note,
Beef, and Bread, and Water.
If I fancy Wine,
I've the cash to buy it;
And my right arm's strong—
Would you like to try it?

II.

I've a vote, I know,
And I mean to use it
As I please myself,
Not as you may choose it;—
Not a vote to sell
For your dirty guineas—
Baits that only catch
Knaves and stup'd ninnies.
Think you, Master Dodge,
I resemble either?
If I do, I'm dead;
If I live, I'm neither!

III.

He who asks my vote
Must, if I support him,
Hold the patriot's course
When the factious court him.
He must know the right;
Love the people duly;
Teach them when they 're wrong;
Serve them well and truly!
And when England fights,
With the world upon her,
He must aid her cause,
And maintain her honour.

IV.

He must hold the scales
Evenly for all men,—
Justly for the great,
Fairly for the small men.
Friendly to the poor,
When hard taxes grieve them,
He must help the State
Wisely to relieve them;
And must own the truth,
That a Christian nation
Owes its meanest child
Healthful education!

V.

Yet I'll give no vote
To an idle meddler,
Or a busy drone
Higgling like a pedler;
To a man who prates
In and out of season,
Thinking Wisdom's self
Meaner than his reason;
With no larger views
Than his parish offices;—
Him I'll not support,
Whatsoe'er he proffers.

VI.

No! I want a man
True, and good, and hearty,
Loving England more
Than he loves his party;—
In great Freedom's troop,
Who will serve unheeding,
Soldier in the ranks,
Or a Captain leading!
If such man I find,
Be he Jones or Hodges,
He shall have my vote,
Spite of all the Dodges!

March 24th, 1857. Charles Mackay.

The Legion of Honour.—The Moniteur publishes a report to the Emperor from the Chancellor of the Legion of Honour, giving an account of the disposal of 400,000 francs intrusted to him for distribution among the old soldiers who served between the years 1792 and 1815. More than 60,000 old soldiers had petitioned for relief. A selection was made, and the 400,000 francs were divided among 4207 chosen from the most aged, the most needy, and the most deserving of the applicants. It appears from the report that there still exist in France and Algeria 67,789 soldiers of the old Imperial army, of whom more than 40,000 require assistance from the Government.

The "Kangaroo"—The Journal de Constantinople of the 12th inst., which had announced the capture of the British steamer Kangaroo by some Russian gun-boats, now corrects that information, and announces the safe arrival of the Kangaroo in the Bosphorous after having landed her passengers and freight on the coast of Circassia. The Russian Ambassador had demanded explanations of the Porte, which had appointed a commission of inquiry.

The Wreck of the "Madrid" Steamer.—The passengers on board the Madrid have given the following testimony regarding the coolness and judgment displayed by the captain of that vessel:—"Captain G. Bradshaw. Vigo. Feb. 21, 1857. Dear Sir,—We, the undersigned passengers per Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Madrid, unfortunately wrecked yesterday, at the entrance of this bay, desire to express our sympathy and condolence with you, and also our sense of the admirable coolness and judgment displayed by you upon that trying occasion: whereby not only the lives, but also the property, of the passengers have been preserved. Signed) E. C. Hilton, Lieut 55th Regt.; R. F. Dalton, Lieut. R.A.; J. D. Bilham, Ensign 36th Regt.; George Hooper, Robt. G Moran." The above-mentioned gentlemen wish to add that Mr. Atkins also sent Captain Bradshaw a letter to the same effect on behalf of himself and family (three ladies and a little girl). These comprised the whole of the chief-cabin passengers.

FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

The advance of spring is creating activity in the magasins of our fashionable milliners and dressmakers. All are busily preparing for the sunshiny days when rich silks and gay colours will enliven our promenades, and diffuse brilliancy through concert-rooms and other places of fashionable resort.

Many dresses of moiré antique, intended for out-door wear, have been made up—some are black, others violet, and many in shades of grey or brown. They are without trimming of any kind, but they are rich in the beauty of their texture and the amplitude of their massive folds, gracefully widening towards the lower part of the skirt, and forming a sort of demi-train behind. With a dress of this description should be worn a mantelet of velvet of the same colour as the silk, and trimmed with a double fall of broad black lace. The bonnet may be of quilted silk, either white or of the hue now so fashionable, called bouton d'or, trimmed with black lace and velvet.

Other dresses, also intended for the promenade or carriage, are made of rich glacé silk; violet, green, dark blue, and brown being the most favourite colours. They have usually three flounces, each edged with a broad bias band of black velvet. With this style of dress a mantelet of black velvet, like that above described, may be suitably worn. The bonnet may be of green or violet-colour terry velvet, ornamented with a single rose and its foliage on one side, or with a cluster of the red berries of the service-tree, mingled with violets.

We may here describe a dress, or rather, as our Parisian friends express it, a complete toilette de promenade, which has just been sent from Paris for an English lady of rank. The robe is of violet-colour taffeta, with three flounces, crenelated at the edges. On each flounce there are placed five or six rows of black velvet, following the direction of the crenelated edges, thus giving to the skirt of the dress the appearance of being figured with a zebra pattern in velvet. The mantelet which accompanies this dress is of violet-colour velvet, edged with a very broad net fringe. This fringe in itself presents a novelty. It is made of chenille of two colours—black and violet—and terminates in large pointed scallops at the edge; to each point there is attached a very long, but very light, tassel of black and violet silk. This fringe was placed over a flounce of velvet: this, it must be observed, is now the invariable method of placing these broad fringes, which, if attached to the edge of the cloak, would hang in very ungraceful style. With the robe and mantelet just described is to be worn a most elegant bonnet of black velvet, adorned with a bird of paradise.

As regards evening dress we need only observe that our Illustrations of Fashion exhibit four of the ball dresses prepared for the ensuing month. They are, therefore, in the very newest style; and, in point of elegance, cannot be surpassed. We would direct the attention of our lady readers to the ribbon head-dresses shown in two of the figures, and may mention that this style of coiffure is rapidly gaining favour. Ribbon head-dresses are particularly well adapted for the theatres, or for occasions on which a sort of demi-full dress is sufficient. They may be made in almost any colour; but pink, blue, cerise, or bouton d'or will be found most effective.

Among the novelties in lingerie is a sleeve just introduced in Paris, where it has obtained great favour. It may be made of muslin or tulle, and consists of one very full puff, confined at the wrist by a bouillon, within which there is a running of coloured ribbon. Above the bouillon a broad cuff of lace or needlework falls back over the sleeve. The cuff is formed of keep vandykes, and, if of needlework, they should be edged with narrow Valenciennes. The vandykes are five or six in number, and between each there is a bow of ribbon of the same colour as that in the running.

Some of the new fans may be said to have attained the perfection of artistic workmanship. The carving and inlaid work of the mother-of-pearl or ivory almost vies with the productions of the 16th century. The paintings which adorn these fans are very superior, judged as works of art. Some represent groups of figures in the style of Watteau; others are copied from Chinese, Persian, or Indian subjects. Fans made of black or white crape, and richly bespangled with gold or silver ornaments, are now very fashionable. They resemble those which, about a century ago, were generally used in Spain—the native land of fans.

Our Illustrations consist of four figures in ball costume. The first figure, that at the extreme left, is represented in a tunic of pink silk over a dress of white tulle. The tunic is open at each side, and is edged with scallops cut out or pinked. The dress worn under the tunic has eight flounces, edged with a flowered design, embroidered in white floss silk. The corsage is in bouillonés, drawn horizontally, and over it is a berthe of pink silk, round the back and descending to a point in front of the waist. The bouquet de corsage, which is worn on one side, consists of two white roses. The short sleeves are formed of two bouillonés of tulle. The head-dress consists of torsades and small bows of pink ribbon, each bow being formed of loops without ends. The second figure shows a robe of blue silk, with double skirt and side trimmings; the latter formed of bouillonés of silk, edged with white lace. The berthe, which is also of silk, is trimmed with narrow lace. The ends are crossed in front, and fixed by two small bows of blue ribbon. On each shoulder there is a bow of the same. The head-dress consists of narrow cordons of blue flowers without foliage. The dress of the third figure is of white tulle over white satin. The berthe is of white tulle edged with blonde, and is fixed in front by a bow of white satin ribbon. The front hair is disposed in rouleaux, and with the back hair are intertwined pendent sprays of flowers. The dress of the fourth figure, that on the extreme right, consists of a double skirt of pink glacé. The lower skirt is trimmed with deep bouillonés of white tulle, fixed at intervals by ruches and bows of pink ribbon. The upper skirt is covered by a tunic of rich Brussels lace, and with the back hair are intertwined pendent sprays of flowers. The dress of the fourth figure, that on the extreme right, consists of a double skirt of pink glacé. The lower skirt is trimmed with deep bouillonés of white tulle, fixed at intervals by ruches and bows of pink ribbon. The upper skirt is covered by a tunic of rich Brussels lace, and with the back hair are intertwined pendent sprays of flowers. The corsage has a berthe of bouillonés of tulle and Brussels lace. It is fastened in front by bows of pink ribbon, and has corresponding bows on the shoulders. The sleeves are formed of one small puff, and under it a deep fall of tulle and lace, which is gathered up in front of the arm. The front hair is plaited, and the ends of the plaits are carried round and fastened at the back of the head by bows and ends of pink ribbon.

Practical Suggestions for Relieving the Overcrowded Thoroughfares of London. By Joseph Mitchell, F.R.S.E. The increase of London, unexampled in Europe since the existence of Imperial Rome, necessarily causes attention to be directed to conveniences of locomotion, when distances are so great, as well as the preservation of salubrity amid so dense a population, living so far from the fresh air of the country, and daily accumulating so vast a mass of animal corruption and vegetable residuum which are now so imperfectly carried off. Mr. Mitchell points out that at the present time there are no less than sixty thousand acres covered by buildings and streets, and that the population in twenty-five years has increased fifty-one per cent. He calculates that, if the population of London was, in 1851, 2,362,236, there must be at present not less than 3,000,000 inhabitants in this metropolis; and that, if the increase continues in the same ratio, twenty years hence the population will not be less than 3,372,000. Already the inconvenience is so great in our thoroughfares that it is a day's journey for a poor man, without the means of locomotion, to go from east to west. Mr. Mitchell therefore proposes that there should be one grand street or thoroughfare from the east to the west end of London, going in almost a straight line from the terminus of the Eastern Counties Railway, with a prolongation across the Park, so as to strike up the central avenue to the basin opposite the Palace. The grand street is to have a railway in the centre and be between the houses, and he is fully aware that the project of carrying a railway across the Park would create alarm: he, therefore, proposes that it should be so sunk and bridged over in so many places level with the ground as to be unseen. The whole of the new population in Nottinghill and Kensington would thus be accommodated with easy access to the City by this grand railway street. There are three other features of the scheme worthy of mention. One is a branch to the south at right angles, crossing Waterloo bridge to the South-Western terminus; and he gives a diagram of how this is to be accomplished. The piers of the bridge are to be prolonged upwards, so as to have a covered way in the manner of the railway-bridge over the Tyne at Newcastle. Another feature is a branch to the General Post office; and, at the same time the main line touches the Smithfield terminus of the newly-conceded Metropolitan Railway, connecting the Great Western and Euston stations. The project is a grand one, and we think not unfeasible. The sewerage is an important subject, to which we have no space at present.

CEREMONY OF LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF A MEMORIAL TO THE LATE MARQUIS OF LONDONDERRY, ON SCRABO HILL, COUNTY DOWN, IRELAND.—(SEE PAGE 300.)

MEMORIAL TO THE LATE MARQUIS OF LONDONDERRY, IN COURSE OF ERECTION ON SCRABO HILL, COUNTY DOWN, IRELAND.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

MEMORIAL TO THE LATE MARQUIS OF LONDONDERRY.

The site of a memorial tower, to be erected on Scrabo Hill, near Newtownards, county Down, Ireland, to the memory of the late Marquis of Londonderry, was laid with great ceremony on the 28th ult. in presence of a large number of the tenantry and others resident on the County Down estates of the late Marquis of Londonderry. The ceremony was a great assemblage of the clergy, gentry, and inhabitants of the neighbourhood. The spot selected for the site of the tower is the loftiest point of Scrabo, and is upwards of 500 feet above the level of Lough Strangford, of which you have a magnificent view, as also of the surrounding country. Mount Stewart, the seat of the Marquis of Londonderry, beautifully situated on the margin of the Lough, the well-wooded demesnes of Greyabbey and Ballywalter Mansion, the seat of Lord Dufferin, Belfast Lough, the distant hills of Down and Antrim, while away east is the Irish Channel, with its many craft passing and repassing, beyond is the Scotch coast, and, to the south, the Isle of Man, which can be discerned in fine weather from this commanding eminence. The town of Newtownards, with its 10,000 busy people, lies almost immediately at the base of the hill.

The monument, a tower in the style of a Scottish château, will be 135 feet high and is to be built of the rough rubble stone (basalt) found on the top of the hill, the cut stone and window dressings being of sandstone. A stone staircase, in the round tower which contains the grand chamber and parapets. The tower, as will be seen, is a striking object from almost all parts the country, will also be of some utility, as affording accommodation for a custodier; and the guard-chamber is intended to be fitted up as an armoury, in which the style of the building will be fully carried out, with oak panels, groined ceiling, &c. The walls will bear inscriptions indicating the monumental purpose of the edifice. The style of the building is considered more particularly applicable, as remains of edifices in the same style may be frequently met with in Ulster; and, being introduced into the country by the descendants of the family of Stewart.

On the day of the ceremonial, at about two o'clock, the Marquis and Marchioness of Londonderry with a large party, arrived from Mount Stewart.

William Sharman Crawford, Esq., D.L., J.P., Chairman of the Building Committee, having returned thanks to Sir Robert Bateson, Bart., of Belvoir Park, for his kindness in acceding to the request of the committee to lay the foundation-stone, Sir Robert replied in an eloquent speech. The Chairman then requested the Lord Bishop of the diocese to pronounce a blessing on the undertaking. This being said, a large glass jar, hermetically sealed, was handed to Sir Robert. It contained a parchment scroll, inscribed

In memory of Charles William Vane, third Marquis of Londonderry: Knight of the Garter, Knight Grand Cross of the Bath, Knight Grand Cross of the Guelph, Knight of Saint George of Russia, Knight of the Black Eagle and of the Red Eagle of Prussia, Knight of the Tower and Sword of Portugal, General in the Army, and Colonel of the 2nd Regiment of her Majesty's Life Guards. This tower is erected by his tenantry and friends.

Fame belongs to History, remembrance to us

The jar also contains a copy of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of the 7th February, with the portrait of her Majesty the Queen, the Lord Chancellor, and the Speaker of the House of Commons; also copies of the Times, the Liverpool Albion, Punch, all the Belfast newspapers, the Downpatrick Recorder, the Downshire Protestant, the Newry Telegraph, the Ordnance Index Map of the county Down, Henderson's Almanack, and the current coins of the realm from a farthing to a sovereign. There was also placed in the jar a list of the subscribers names, printed upon the tenantry on the county Down estates of the late Marquis, and the remainder the names of nobility and gentry of this and other countries, at the head of whom stands the Empress Eugénie.

The glass bell-house contains the present Marquis of Londonderry's autograph, with the words "Lieutenant of the County Down, 28th Feb., A.D. 1855." Upon a parchment scroll are inscribed the names of the committee, followed by those of the honorary secretaries (Wm. R. Mackie, Esq., and Wm. Parr, Esq.), and of the architect (Charles Lanyon, Esq., and Lynn, Esq.) concluding with the following inscription, founded, as stated by Sir Robert Bateson, Bart., of Belvoir Park, 28th Feb., 1855."

The jar having been placed in the cavity prepared for its reception, a silver trowel (a beautiful workmanship was handed by the Chairman to Sir Robert Bateson, the stone, having a flag bearing the family arms flying above it, was then slowly lowered to its place—the ceremony being performed in the usual manner.

The last stone having declared the stone properly laid, the union-jack was hoisted on the summit of the hill. On the signal a Royal salute was fired from a battery of guns placed on a neighbouring eminence, the battery afterwards firing minute guns. The band of the Royal North Down Rifles then played "God Save the Queen," "Partant pour la Syrie," and the Royal North Down Quick step, after which the ceremony ended.

The band entered Newtownards playing popular airs. The day being fine, and it being the weekly market-day, the town was crowded with the farmers of the surrounding district, whose respectable appearance indicated the prosperity enjoyed by the inhabitants of this populous portion of the country, the Yorkshire of Ireland.

The two accompanying views—one of the scene on the day of the foundation ceremony; and the other of the Memorial Tower, as it will appear when completed, are from clever sketches by William Howard Borgess.

ATTEMPTED ESCAPE OF ROMAN POLITICAL PRISONERS.

The most exciting piece of intelligence that has presented itself since my last letter is an attempt on the part of the prisoners confined in the castle of Paliano chiefly for political offences, to escape, et cetera, from that place of detention. The attempt took place about four o'clock in the afternoon of Saturday last, and various accounts of the occurrence were current in the cafés and streets of Rome on the following day; but the most authentic appeared on Monday morning with more or less details. It appears that the prisoners had chosen the hour allotted for taking exercise in the court as most propitious for their attempt. Instead of turning, as they had been previous places of confinement, some of them seized in the evening of the preceding day in the Piazza Arme, whilst others broke through the ceiling of the prison wards and got upon the roof of the barracks and sentinels. By the latter mode, making use of the tools with which they had vowed to work at certain hours, broke open the door of the head gaoler's room, to get the keys from him. Those on the roof of the barracks solicited the roof to gain admission into the building, and gave the soldiers' arms, whilst the other prisoners who had got on the ground of the ordinary enclosure set to work to keep the troops from entering the barracks by forcing the doors. Some of the rioters meanwhile got into the court of the great tower of the fortress, which is flanked by four towers with windows or loops and bricked. In the act of firing, however, of which the prisoners were certain to hear the report, several of the commanders of the garrison of the castle, who had been at dinner, gave their men orders to fire, with bayonets at the ready, on the prisoners should they attempt to assault, with the loss of four of their number killed and five wounded. Letter from Rome, March 5.

GLOBES OF SAND ON IRON.—A curious piece of pleasure is at present going on in the Revue and Gazette in which Monsieur George Sand has her novels. Henri Martin, the historian, Ary Scheffer the painter, and one or two other Republicans. Madame Sand has given a novel called "Daniella" to the feuilleton of the Presse, and this was in course of publication, when, a few days back, M. de la Forge addressed a letter to the directors of the Siècle saying he is surprised that Monsieur Martin should not express his opinion of what has been published of his romance, but rather by Madame Sand than to wait, upon these gentlemen have commissioned M. de la Forge to do what he has done; and that, had they any remarks to make to her, they would have found some other means of making them. Thereto, M. de la Forge quarantors. repeating all he had said the first time, and at the bottom of his letter he prints an attestation signed by all the individuals named, except by Henri Martin, and in which the persons in question say they did authorise M. de la Forge to do what he did. At the same time Henri Martin, in a very long letter, states that he was not one of the protesting parties, and that he wonders the others protested. The view of the case taken by this gentleman seems to me to be the right one; for after all, the opinions put into the mouths of the various personages of the novel, upon no matter what subject are scarcely fairly to be assumed as representing the author's own opinions, and when, as is the case here, a writer has, like Madame Sand, given for years pledges of her ability to [illegible] it is absurd to [illegible] Letter from Paris.

Without their consent the renunciation of the King would not be valid."

CHESS IN RUSSIA.

We are indebted to Russia for so much that is valuable on the theory of the game, and for so many admirable examples of practical skill that every amateur here will rejoice to find that our Chess communications that we may once more calculate on enriching our columns with those masterly contests which have given such high reputation to Russian Chess is known, to the names of the Princes Ouroussoff, and to those of Petroff, Jaenisch, Shumoff, and other leading members of the Circle des Echecs in St Petersburg. The two following games form part of a match played in Consultation, that order of play which seems to have become fashionable all over Europe since its adoption at the St George's Club. The combatants on the one side being Prince Demetrius Ouroussoff and Mr. Von Mikuloff, and on the other Mr Von Jaenisch and Mr Schumoff.

Notes by Mr. Von Jaenisch

(a) This sacrifice decides the partie in Black's favour. White, why this, it must have won a Pawn, entirely overlooking the consequences their adversaries adopted.

(b) It would have been much better to have played the Queen to K 3rd, and continued the game thus:-

(a) This sortie for [illegible] White Queen [illegible] ...ollowed up the sacrifice of the Q B P, and continued his dangerous attack on the opposite [illegible] Queenside.

(b) As shown, it is all hazardous because Black cannot take the K Pawn without deranging there game. White's first fault in this game was in playing P to K 5th at their 7th move instead of taking the Queen's Pawn with their Bishop.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

THE country has declared itself emphatically in the Borough elections. It is by the voice of the Boroughs that it speaks, for the Counties are slow to articulate, and always sing the same song to the same tune. Though Lord Palmerston, in dissolving the late Parliament, only asked the opinion of the constituencies on the one point of his foreign policy, the constituencies were not in the humour to narrow their verdict to so thin a point, and the deliverance which they have rendered has shaped itself into three very distinct issues. They have declared, in the first place, that they cordially approve of the whole foreign policy of the Government—whether in relation to the war in the Crimea, the peace negotiations in Paris, the hostilities against Persia, or the dispute with the Cantonese. In the second place, they have marked their displeasure at the dictation of the Peace-at-all-price party, and the Rump of the Anti-Corn-law League, by rejecting all candidates, however eminent, eloquent, and able, who made themselves busy and mischievous in the late Parliament by their support of the Emperor Nicholas, and by their still more unpatriotic support of Governor Yeh. In the third place, they have most unmistakably expressed their opinion that its foreign policy, however great and wise, is not of itself sufficient to warrant their hearty support of the existing Government; but that, if their confidence is to be retained and strengthened, the Minister must have a domestic policy in accordance with the spirit of the age and the expressed wants of the people. With the first and second of these manifestations of the national will the Premier and his Government will be highly satisfied. To the third he will endeavour to conform his policy as best he may.

The most remarkable circumstance connected with the elections is the disappearance from the House of Commons of what is called the Manchester school of politicians. The well-known names of John Bright, Richard Cobden, William Johnson Fox, and Milner Gibson, with some smaller personages of the same section of opinion, will not appear in the roll of the new Parliament. It is probable that means will be found, on some future day, to restore Mr. Cobden, if not Mr. Bright, to a place in the Legislature. But in the mean time the country has pronounced their exclusion, and given them a lesson which they will do well to take to heart. The men who aspire to be English statesmen must possess English sympathies. They may be in advance of their countrymen, but not so far in advance as to lose themselves in the vague and misty regions of an impossible philanthropy. They may be men of genius, but they must be of that practical order of genius—the very highest—which never loses sight of common sense or takes its foot from the solid earth, to fly with artificial wings to the clouds, and collapse in the attempt. Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright were excellent men. They were bold, eloquent, and honest. They rendered good service to the British nation, to the highest classes as well as to the lowest, and advanced the soundest principles of social and commercial economy for the instruction not only of their own countrymen but of all the civilised nations of the earth. During the period of the Anti-Corn-law agitation they seemed to possess every quality of mind and character to fit them for the leadership of the great party of Reform and Progress. There was no height of ambition within the reach of British subjects which at that time would have been considered too lofty for their aims, or too great a reward for their wisdom and energy. But they did not understand the great nation whom they aspired to teach. They forgot the existence of a popular heart, and were only right upon one single principle of Social Economy. They were mere traders, with the souls of traders, and doctrinaires of commerce, who, on all other subjects but that of the Corn-laws and Free-trade, possessed the narrowest ideas, and the most impracticable notions. In their estimation man was a creature whose proper function was to buy food and raiment at the lowest price, and to sell at the highest price in the markets of the world the commodities which he manufactured; and to do both of these things and carry on the government at the smallest possible amount of taxation. Questions of national honour and dignity were not within the range of their vision. Our place in the commonwealth of Europe, the security of our Asiatic dependencies, the retention of our Colonial empire, were held to be of no account compared with Free-trade. As recluses, philosophers, and writers of books, or, even as preachers and lecturers, desirous to advance a particular doctrine, they might have been entitled to praise and gratitude; but as statesmen, and managers of the public business of a nation, they had not the popular sympathies which are essential to success, nor the plain, straightforward practical common sense, without which it is impossible to govern mankind. Men are not creatures of pure reason. If they were, Governments would be unnecessary; for each man, like Abraham of old days, would be a king and a priest unto himself. It was the mistake of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, in dealing with great questions, to rely too much upon reason, and to make no allowance for the instincts and passions of the human heart. Hence they lost their power of usefulness, and threw away one of the grandest opportunities that in latter days has fallen to the lot of public men. If ever they reappear in the arena of politics, it is likely that their temporary seclusion will have taught them wisdom, and that they may be induced to acknowledge the truth that those who aspire to govern must, first of all, understand the characters of men. To manage a steam-engine may be easy to minds of such a class; but a State is a machine of a more complicated kind, and requires very different handling.

Not less remarkable among the results of the Election is the return of Lord John Russell for the city of London. At this result we unfeignedly rejoice, partly from circumstances personal to Lord John Russell himself, and partly from the character which it cannot fail to impress upon the Administration of which he is not a member. The British public love courage. If Lord John Russell had not been courageous, or, as the commonalty prefer to phrase it, "plucky," he would not at this moment have been the representative of the City. His chances at one time seemed all but hopeless. Unpopular for his mismanagement at Vienna—still more unpopular for having voted with Mr. Cobden in condemnation of the policy of the Government in the dispute at Canton—rejected by an Association that was once powerful enough to control the election—and deserted by many influential persons who were formerly his firm supporters and members of his Committee, it seemed in the highest degree improbable that he would ever again be returned for London. But his dignity was hurt by the contemptuous mode in which it was proposed to get rid of him; and, in a happy hour for his fame, he resolved to appeal to the many against the dictation of the few; to recall to the popular mind what he had done for the cause of civil and religious liberty, and what he still had it in his power to do; and, while admitting his fallibility or his faults in minor instances, to plead the general issue of his public character and services. He proved in this that he knew the people; and he gained his election, partly for the courage he displayed, and partly because, in default of plainer speaking on the part of Lord Palmerston, he was the most illustrious, and, with all his occasional shortcomings, the most consistent, useful, and able representative of the Reform principle who could be sent to the new Parliament. With that character, strengthened by the choice of the citizens of London, he will take his seat, and compel Lord Palmerston, on the penalty of losing office, to become as good a reformer as himself—or, perchance, a better.

Altogether the elections are of a character to strengthen the Government both at home and abroad, and to place in the hands of Lord Palmerston a power which, if used for good will make him the most successful Minister of modern times. With a majority strong enough to enable him to carry any measure he may propose, and with an Opposition sufficiently powerful to prevent him from becoming apathetic, the country may expect great things from such a Minister. His past career justifies the public belief that in this, the culminating point of his political fortunes, he will be true to his own glory and to the greatness of his country.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

THE WAR IN PERSIA.—BATTLE OF KOOSH-AB.

THE news from Persia by the last Overland Mail shows that the Shah, instead of evincing any symptoms of a desire for submission, was, up to the latest dates, more obstinate than ever. The Bombay papers contain intelligence of a rather smart engagement having been fought between the British and Persian troops, at a place called Koosh-ab, on the 8th February. Sir James Outram, learning that a large body of Persians, under the command of Mohsje-ood-Dowlah in person, was hovering around Bushire, resolved at once to bring matters to an issue. The troops—consisting of the 3rd Cavalry, the Poonah Horse, the 64th Foot, the 2nd European Light Infantry, the 78th Highlanders, the Sappers and Miners, the 20th Native Infantry, the 4th Rifles, the 26th Native Infantry, the Beloochees, Third Troop Horse Artillery, 3rd and 5th Light Field Batteries numbering in all 419 sabres, 2212 European Infantry, 2022 Native Infantry, and 18 guns—marched from Bushire on the evening of the 3rd of February. They proceeded without tents or additional clothing of any sort each man carried his great-coat, blanket, and two days' cooked provisions. After a march of forty-six miles in forty-one hours, during which they were exposed to the worst of weather, cold nights and deluging storms of rain, they reached the enemy's intrenched position, at the village of Barazjoon, on the afternoon of the 5th, but found it abandoned. The enemy, on hearing of the approach of the British troops, had evacuated their intrenchments so precipitately that their tents and camp equipage, and ordnance magazine, were abandoned. The former were hastily appropriated by the village plunderers operating for some hours before our troops arrived. Every exertion was made to intercept the retreat of some bodies of the enemy's cavalry still in sight, and some little skirmishing with a few horsemen took place, but eventually they all made off. After occupying for two days the position the enemy had evacuated at Barazjoon, and hearing that they had succeeded in getting the guns which they carried away into the difficult pass of "Mlak," the troops commenced their return march on the night of the 7th, carrying away the large stores of flour, rice, and grain, which the Persian Government had collected for their army, and destroying their magazine. Found to contain about 50,000 pounds of powder, with small-arm ammunition, and a vast quantity of shot and shells; thereby crippling the future operations of their army. Some of the guns are supposed to have been cast into wells, and, as their wheels fell into our hands, cannot be again used. At midnight an attack was made upon the rear-guard by the enemy's horse, and parties threatened the line of march on every side: the troops were halted and so formed as to protect the baggage and resist the horsemen, in whatever direction they might attempt to charge. Before this was quite completed four of the enemy's guns of heavy metal were opened upon the force, but the darkness of the night prevented any steps being taken to capture them. At break of day the Persian force, amounting to between 6000 or 8000 men, with five guns, was discovered on the left rear, north-east of the line of march of our army. The cavalry and artillery immediately moved rapidly to the attack, supported by two lines of infantry, a third protecting the baggage. The fire of artillery was most excellent, and did great execution; the cavalry also twice charged with great gallantry and success: indeed upon these two occasions fell the whole brunt of the action, as the enemy moved away too rapidly for the infantry to overtake them. By ten o'clock the defeat of the Persians was complete: two guns, with a large quantity of ammunition, were captured; and at least 700 men lay dead upon the field. The wounded, the number of which must have been considerable, had been carried away; the remainder fled in a disorganised state, generally throwing away their arms which strewed the field in vast numbers; and nothing but the want of a sufficient body of cavalry to follow up the victory prevented their total destruction, and capture of the remaining guns. The troops bivouacked for the day, close to the battle-field, and at night accomplished a march of twenty miles over a country rendered almost impassable by the heavy rain which fell incessantly. After a rest of six hours the greater portion of the infantry continued their march to Bushire, which they reached before midnight on the 9th February, thus performing another harassing march of forty-four miles under incessant rain, besides fighting and defeating the enemy during its progress within a short period of fifty hours. The cavalry and artillery, with an infantry escort, reached camp on the morning of the 10th. The result is most satisfactory, and will, General Outram thinks, have a very beneficial effect on our future operations in Persia.

The news from Bushire comes down to the 17th, or a week after the action. General Havelock had arrived, with the two Brigadiers and other officers of his division, to reinforce or continue to be sent from Bombay. The steam-frigate Ajdaha, towing two transports, left the harbour on the 4th February, with the first division of the 14th Light Dragoons, and the rest of the corps follows shortly. The 25th Native Infantry, now stationed at Ahmedabad, have received orders to hold themselves in readiness to proceed on foreign service; and it seems likely that the 3rd European Regiment, from Poonah, will go also. The latest item of news of this kind is the receipt by the authorities at the arsenal of an order to prepare two 8-inch mortars, two 5-inch howitzers, and six 12-lb. iron guns for immediate shipment. These pieces are no doubt intended to strengthen the works at Bushire, preparatory perhaps to the place being left in charge of a sufficient garrison; while the bulk of the army proceeds up the gulf to Mahommerah, at the mouth of the river Karun.

THE WAR IN CHINA.

By the Overland Mail, via Marseilles, which arrived on Thursday, we have advices from Hong-Kong to the 17th of February. Trade was at a stand. The attention of the European inhabitants of Hong-Kong was chiefly directed to means for their protection against the Chinese. The accounts from the northern ports were more satisfactory.

It was very generally credited that Commissioner Yeh had received the Imperial commands as to his conduct and policy for the future. It is said that the Emperor has expressed the highest confidence in Yeh's ability to deal with foreigners, and although recommending clemency, yet that failing, the barbarians were to be driven into the sea. Accounts from Canton say that, under Yeh's direction, the ploughshare had traversed the site of the late factories, which the Commissioner had sown with salt.

His Excellency the Admiral returned to Hong-Kong on the 13th February in the Niger, bringing intelligence of an engagement between the Hornet and two divisions of Imperial junks, which was successful, without the steamer sustaining any loss. The affair took place below Powder Island. On nearing, the junks descended the creek to meet or intercept the steamer. The latter was within 1800 yards of the junks she opened fire with her bow guns and steadily advanced to within 800 yards. When in two-and-a-half fathoms water, broadsides of shot and shell were poured into the junks. The junks soon tried to escape, and, with one exception (which blew up), they got away with damage. A second division came down to Fuzeekee Creek, when the Hornet was joined by the small steamer Hong-Kong, in command of Lieutenant Dent, of the Sybille. These junks speedily retreated, with much loss; the upper division of junks were also fired into, but, the Hornet's guns peppered them till nightfall. The Barracouta was sent by the Admiral to support the Hornet, but reached too late to be of service. One junk was captured with thirteen guns, two of them being English 24-pounders. Three dead Chinese were found below. Next day scarcely the fragment of a junk was to be seen. Against these large fleets of war-junks gun-boats alone can offer a really effective opposition.

Ahlum, the partner, if not sole proprietor, of the Chinese shop called the Esing shop, had been captured and brought to Hong-Kong, examined, and committed for trial, with nine others in his employment, one of them being his father. Forty-two other persons were also captured, but were not put on their trial. On Monday, the 2nd February, Ahlum and his nine fellow-prisoners were arraigned before Chief Justice Hulme to answer the charge of administering poison with intent to kill and murder James Carroll Dempster, colonial surgeon. The Hon. Thomas Anstey, Attorney-General, prosecuted for the Crown; Crown Solicitor Mr. Hickson and Mr. G. Cooper Turner, solicitor, assisting. Dr. Bridges and Mr. Day, counsel, with Messrs. Gaskell and Brown and Mr. H. J. Tarrant, solicitors, defended the prisoners. The trial extended over five days, and resulted in a verdict of not guilty, by a majority of five jurors to one. Ahlum and the others were arrested on their leaving the court under a recent ordinance. Since then an application has been made, by interested parties, that Ahlum shall be allowed to settle his affairs, and then be voluntarily deported. Another petition was presented that he should be deported to Formosa; and a third that he shall be detained in custody as a person too dangerous to be allowed to communicate with the Mandarins.

The Hon. Company's steamer Auckland had had a smart brush with Mandarin junks, on which occasion she was accompanied by the small steamer Esquiet. The engagement took place off Toong-Chung with four war-junks heavily armed. After a smart fire the junks were captured and burnt. The steamer's boats pushed for the shore, where, on landing, they captured a battery mounting sixteen guns, which they spiked, and set fire to a village near by. To the westward were observed extensive fortifications, which it was found were too strong to be attacked without a larger force. One man belonging to the Auckland was shot dead through the eye and four others were wounded. The following expended all her ammunition returned to Hong-Kong. The Admiral sent the Niger on the 16th Feb. to join the Auckland, and the Esquiet was to follow on the 18th.

(From the China Mail, Feb. 17.)

We understand that a paper has been forwarded hither from Canton as well as from the north, purporting to be a decree of the Emperor. It directs the high authorities of the province to conciliate the barbarians, but not to alarm the people; expresses confidence in Yeh's knowledge of the barbarian, and his consequent capacity to settle this affair with the British, on whom, if their loss in the engagements reported, viz. of the 12th, including the Admiral, has discouraged them sufficiently to cause a cessation of hostilities on their part, Yeh is not to be over-severe, but they are not to be met half way. Such a concession in the present case had to a demand for other concessions. That is to say, it must not be supposed that the Government of China is not ready to resist barbarian encroachment; but, with rebellion in the field, warlike preparations elsewhere might be turned against it. It has enough, otherwise on hand now to task it exterminating the barbarian, and, doubtless, Yeh will be able to settle the quarrel, which is as it has been, on the foreigner's part. Meantime, if there will, of course, be no sign of yielding, so long as Canton maintains its character as a city not to be taken.

(From the Hong-Kong Register, Feb. 17.

The Auckland, with the Esquiet in company, ran down to outside Ling Tin on Saturday last. When off Toong-Chung they sighted four large heavily-armed Mandarin junks, which, it is said, have been intercepting a provision and other boats coming to Hong-Kong. The steamers saw the boats were heavily armed and manned, and they, therefore, ran into the Auckland unfortunately got ashore on a bar, but the Esquiet ran in with the boats. The junks opened fire, and continued it very briskly, but without doing any damage: the steamers and boats returned the fire, and the junks were captured, and their crews pushed on shore. On finding they captured a battery mounting 16 guns, which they spiked and, as far as we could make out, set fire to a village near.

NEUFCHATEL. THE CONFERENCE.

The Neufchatel Conference met on Wednesday last, for the sixth time, the Prussian and Swiss Plenipotentiaries being present. The last instructions received by De Kern are said to be more yielding than previously, and M. de Hatzfeldt is never less restrictive. At this meeting it is said that some advance was really made, and it was expected that the first protocol would be pamphlet during the sitting. Concessions will have to be made on both sides. On the one hand, the Swiss Confederation agree to recognise the sovereignty of the King of Neufchatel, on condition of his immediately renouncing it, and, on the other, the King either considerably lowers or abandons the claim for indemnity. It will thus be seen that some business has been really done, and if no difficulty arises from the uncertain temper of the King there is at last a probability of the matter being soon arranged.

AUSTRALIA.

On Wednesday evening the Wilth Star packet-ship belonging to the White Star line arrived in the Mersey from Melbourne, with 176 passengers and 20,660 ounces of gold on freight. She left Port Phillip Head January 15. The Donald M'Kay had arrived in eighty-five days and the Typhoon in eighty-seven. The British American packet-ship, arrived from Southampton in fifty-five days. The Red Charter was to sail on the 17th ult. There is no political news of importance. Flour had fallen in price at Geelong. There was a great demand for all sorts of goods.

The Parliament reassembled on the 6th of January. The Governor-General, in his address, stated that there was a net increase on the general revenue of £317,447. A bill introduced by Mr Duffy for abolishing the property qualification for members of the Assembly was read a second time with a majority of seven votes against the Government. The Government had also suffered other defeats on minor subjects.

The Melbourne Age of the 1st of January states that in the previous week a larger quantity of gold had been received by escort than in any previous week during the year, owing probably, to the high price consequent upon the increased demand for shipment. Nuggets weighing respectively 441 ounces, 180 ounces, and 112 ounces are reported to have been picked up at Amherst. At Dunolly one of 156 ounces had been found.

MEXICO.

By the Red Fox Capt. Sabiss, via New Orleans we have received intelligence from Tampico, under date of 19th February. It appears that since the defeat of Colonel Moreno, who had been dispatched by President Comonfort to take charge of the government of the State of Tampico de Tamaulipas, at Pueblo Viejo, the city of Tampico had been held in siege by General Garza, the ex-Governor, whilst without the city the usurped authority of the revolutionary Government was defended by Colonel Gautier, against both Garza and Moreno. Trade, of course, was completely at a stand; goods on which duty had been paid when Garza was in power were seized on their transit into the interior, and sold by auction at the command of Garza; and fresh exactions were being attempted by Gautier, who was desirous of turning the sunny hour for having making to his own advantage. Meantime there were no less than six rival claimants for the governorship, and the officers of the National Guards were daily making pronunciamentos, in sections, some for Garza, others for Gautier, Castillo, Hinojosa, &c., according as they might expect to share in the plunder of the public by the success of their favourite chiefs. Garza, who, on hearing that Colonel Tomas Moreno, a brave officer and one of the heroes of the War of Independence, and again of the Plan of Ayutla, had been appointed to the command of Tampico by the Supreme Government, had resigned; but, on hearing of the disturbances within the city, he made renewed efforts to re-establish himself. On the 5th February he sent his second in command under a flag of truce to have a parlamento on his behalf. His deputy represented to the Tampiqueans that Garza was encamped but four miles off, and had a force of 2000 well-appointed men, and would certainly attack the city, unless 124,000 dollars were sent to him to pay his debts from Montero to Tampico. On receipt of this consideration he promised to withdraw his troops and claim for the governorship and would allow but twenty-four hours for consideration. As this threat was known to be mere impotent bombast, the commissioner had to retire, curtly snubbed with a refusal. Preparations were made for defence. At the warehouse (English, of our correspondent the windows were blocked up. The ordinary defences are thick doors, plated inside and outside with copper; the massive iron bars or gratings the additional ones were copings of four large iron hooks to the doors: then, inside the bars, double rows of massive planks; next a row of narrow boxes of Milan steel, about 1½ pound weight, then at each window about thirty boxes of "Britannias" roped together. "On these" Colonel Cumberledge, the English Consul, said "a 64-pounder could make no impression." In addition some tons of Manchester prints, "domestic," &c., were placed as bulwarks at points of expected attack. Clerks, cargadores, &c., were armed with Mississippi rifles revolvers, and bowie-knives, and the Manchester men at Tampico were determined to resist plunderers with true British pluck and obstinacy. "Never," says our correspondent, "in the memory of the oldest merchants, was this continually-distracted country in so fearful a state of anarchy as on Tuesday last (Feb. 17). There had been two commissions over to Pueblo Viejo, and all had been arranged for General Moreno to enter Tampico as the Governor of the State, and as the representative of the Supreme Government of Mexico. When his troops were coming through the Hamo de San Francisco the National Guards of Tampico let fly at them with metralla (grapeshot). Moreno's people instantly disembarked and marched back overland to Pueblo. The old General, disgusted at this apparent treachery, vowed vengeance, and he is one to keep a promise of this kind. During the night we had three pronunciamentos in favour of Garza, Castilla, and Moreno. Garza having heard of this contretemps, now, in his turn, prepared to enter the city, but retired as General Moreno entered on the 19th February, amid the booming of cannon, the clamour of bells, and a feu de joie of rifles, firing of rockets, &c.

THE DOWAGER LADY TALBOT DE MALAHIDE.

THE RIGHT HON. ANNE SARAH, DOWAGER BARONESS TALBOT DE MALAHIDE, died on the 15th ult., at her residence, Evercreech House, near Shepton Mallett, Somersetshire. Her Ladyship was the second daughter and coheiress of the late Samuel Rodbard, Esq., of Evercreech House; and was married, in 1801, to James, third Lord Talbot de Malahide, Lord Malahide being the cousin of Dublin who succeeded to the Irish peerage on the death of his elder brother, Richard Wogan the second Lord, in 1849, and the present Important Man. Her Ladyship having had by her Ladyship eight sons and five daughters. The eldest son is the present Lord Talbot de Malahide, so well and worthily known in scientific agricultural, and other learned circles, who was recently elevated to the Peerage of the United Kingdom. By the lamented demise of his mother, the Dowager Baroness, inherits the Evercreech property.

J. M. KEMBLE, ESQ.

JOHN MITCHELL KEMBLE, the eminent Anglo-Saxon scholar and archæologist, departed this life at Gresham's Hotel, Dublin, on the 26th ult. Mr. Kemble was the eldest son of the late famous actor, Charles Kemble. He derived his earlier education from Dr. Richardson, the mineralogist, and author of the "Philosophy of Geology," and from Benjamin Heath Malkin Master of King Edward the Sixth's Grammar School Bury St. Edmunds. In 1830 Mr. Kemble entered at Trinity College, Cambridge, and there graduated B.A. and M.A. After leaving college Mr. Kemble travelled in Germany, and perfected his knowledge of the Teutonic Languages. Mr. Kemble's acknowledged works bear but a small proportion to the number of his contributions to history, antiquities, philology, and general literature. He was well versed in Spanish literature also. For many years Mr. Kemble was editor of the British and Foreign Quarts ly Review. At the time of his decease he held the office of Examiner of Plays and the Lord Chamberlain's. Among the most important of Mr. Kemble's works are the "Codex Diplomaticus Ævi Saxonici," "The Anglo-Saxon Charters," "The Anglo-Saxon Poetry of the Vercelli" "The Dialogues of Solomon and Saturnus," and "The History of the English Commonwealth till the Period of the Norman Conquest." Mr. Kemble wrote in German an able pamphlet entitled "Hamm-Tafel."

W. SCORESBY, F.R.S.

THE [illegible] William Scoresby, was died at Torquay, [illegible] after a lingering illness, was the son of an able and distinguished seaman in the northern whale-fishery, and was born at Whitby, in Yorkshire. He early accompanied his father in his voyages, and, when chief mate of his father's ship, the Resolution, of Whitby, in 1890, he sailed to the highest latitude then reached by navigators. He continued in the whaling service after his father's death, and had performed voyages in twelve successive seasons, when in 1811-20 he published the first volume of his "Arctic Regions," one of the most interesting records of maritime adventure ever written. After his retirement from active duty at sea, Captain Scoresby entered [illegible] and took a Doctor's degree. His "Discourses to the Clergy" which he published did him high credit in his new and [illegible] vocation. Dr. Scoresby in the latter years of his life enriched the Edinburgh Philosophical Journal, and various scientific periodicals with occasional contributions from his pen on subjects of natural history and meteorology.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

MEMBERS RETURNED.

In the following list we have given the members returned to the new Parliament up to the time we go to press, with such marks attached to each as will give some clue to their position. L and C signify Liberal and Conservative; but, as parties have been much dislocated by the division on the China question, we have also endeavoured to mark the bias of each member by attaching the O or M for Opposition and Ministerial.

The range of temperature during the week was 24°18.

The week has been much overcast and the weather generally unsettled during the past week, particularly on the days of March 29, 30, and 31. On March 29 rain fell almost incessantly during the forenoon and evening. Some heavy showers fell on the afternoon and night of the 30th. A severe hailstorm occurred at 4h. 40 p.m. of the 31st, on which occasion two vivid flashes of lightning were seen, and were accompanied by loud thunder.

The air, which was clear on the afternoon of March 26 and 28, on the morning of April 1, and for a few hours on the night of the 28th. The wind was blowing freshly on the day of the 29th.

The daily means are obtained from observations made at 6h. and 10h. a.m., and 2h., 6h., and 10h. p.m., on each day, except Sunday, when the first observation is omitted. The corrections for diurnal variations are taken from the tables of Mr. Glaisher. The "Dew-point" and "Relative Humidity" are calculated, from observations of the dry and wet bulb thermometers, by Dr. Apjohn's Formula and Dalton's Tables of the Tension of Vapour. The movement of the wind is given by a self-recording Robinson's Anemometer, the amount stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

THE SPEAKERSHIP. We have reason to anticipate that, at the meeting of Parliament, the Right Hon Matthew Talbot Baines will be proposed for the Speakership, with the concurrence of the heads of the Liberal party. Mr Baines's high personal qualifications for the office, and the esteem in which he is held by every class of Liberal politicians, will, in all probability, deter the Tories from putting forward a candidate in opposition to the right hon gentleman.—Manchester Guardian.

CHINESE CRIMINAL LED TO EXECUTION.—FROM A DRAWING BY A CHINESE ARTIST.

CHINESE TORTURES.

THE penal code of China, arranged under no fewer than fifteen hundred and fifty-seven heads, is marked by great barbarity. The punishments are in general most cruel, and ill proportioned to the crimes for which they are inflicted: for the slightest offence a mandarin is degraded, banished, and even deprived of all property. We have engraved three specimens of the Chinese tortures, selected from a series of beautifully-executed drawings in colours, upon rice-paper, in a small folio volume, which has been obtained in Canton by an officer of the Hon. East India Company's Service. Some of the tortures which are pictured in this volume are most repulsive, and altogether too cruel and barbarous for reproduction. Those which we have selected will serve to convey some idea of the cruelties by which the penal code of the Chinese is to this day disgraced.

First is a criminal being led by a chain to execution. A flat lath, or strip of wood, which is attached to his neck in such a manner as to project above his head, bears, in Chinese characters, a description of his crime; the nature of which, however, it is difficult to guess, on account of the number of capital offences in the Chinese code.

The second Illustration shows the next stage in the criminal's doom—the Garotte, with which, partly through "ticket-of-leave" experiments, the people of this country have of late become acquainted. The Chinese infliction is a terrible torture. In the accompanying Illustration the criminal is seen attached to a cross by cords, which the executioner gradually tightens by means of a lever till the blood gushes from the eyes, nose, ears, and mouth of the culprit.

The last scene shows the head of the criminal exposed in a cage whilst, as a climax to the punishment, his children are, by the merciful consideration of the Celestial authorities, made to take a moral lesson by looking at the disfigured head of their dead father.

A drawing illustrative of decapitation and disembowelling (which intervenes between that of the garotte and the exposure of the head) is too horrible for publication.

CHINESE BANNER.

IN a silk-producing country like China, noted alike for its skill in embroidery, symbols, and distinctions, we are not surprised to find great importance attached to banners. We engrave a specimen of one with an inscription, the subject of which our correspondents who are skilled in the Chinese language may translate, and thus enable us hereafter to communicate to our readers.

AMHERSTIA NOBILIS.

THIS exotic, which may be considered as the rarest plant in England, is now flourishing in full bloom in the new conservatory built purposely for its reception by the Marchioness of Londonderry at Wynyard. The plant, when very small a foot high was brought from India by Sir James Hogg, and presented by him to the Marchioness. Great care and expense have been bestowed upon it under the direction of her Ladyship, who has had the gratification to see it blossom twice—in January, 1855, and during the past month. There are not more than two of these plants known to exist in this country. There were three of them in 1855; but the one in the possession of the Duke of Devonshire, at Chatsworth, which was procured at great cost, has died. The Marchioness, with her usual liberality, has had several racemes of the flowers cut, and sent to noblemen and other friends for preservation in herbariums.

The plant at Wynyard is about ten feet high, having ligneous stems and branches, bearing long pinnate leaves like the walnut, and throwing off pendulous racemes eighteen inches long, containing about six large polypetalous flowers, of vermilion colour, the upper margin of the corolla being beautifully touched with a rich yellow. It is of the class Diadelphia, order Decandria (Linn.), natural order Leguminosæ Cassiæ. The pod or capsule is inclosed in a nectarium about two inches long; at the base of this grow two bractese, or wings, of the same colour as the flower, three inches long, and five petals spring from the mouth of the nectarium, something like the woodbine (Lonicera). The plant in England bears no seed. It is considered a rarity in India, and is only found in peculiarly-favoured spots, at the foot of mountains, and near the Salwen river.

Dr. Wallich, of Calcutta, in "Plantæ Asiaticæ Rariores," says:—"The first notice I had of this magnificent tree was at Rangoon, in 1826, when I first saw some of the dried flowers. It was not even known by name at the capital of the Burman Empire. In going into the interior of the country to examine the teak forests I came upon an old temple (Kionin), on the bank of the river Salwen, twenty-seven miles from the town of Martaban, and in the gardens there, for the first time, saw this magnificent tree in royal colours of red and yellow. It was forty feet high, and had a bole two feet in diameter. There was a small one also, and both were perfectly ornamented from bottom to top with their splendid flowers, forming a gorgeous pyramid of the richest colours in green, red, and yellow, he says, 'unequalled in the Flora of the East, and, I presume, not surpassed in magnificence and elegance in any part of the world.' The ground around the trees was strewed with fallen flowers, and the inhabitants of the district carried them as a daily offering to the image that they worshipped." The Doctor had a draughtsman with him, who took an accurate drawing of the flower, which has been published." He adds—"There can be no doubt that this tree, when in full foliage and blossom, is the most strikingly-superb object which can possibly be imagined."

The tree was first brought into notice by Lady Sarah Amherst, a great promoter of botanical science in India. Lord Amherst spent five years in that country, and made an excursion to the Himalaya mountains, at the foot of which they discovered these rare trees. Several attempts have been made to bring living specimens to England, but the sea-air generally kills them, and only three had arrived safely. It may be possible to introduce the seed in the pod hermetically sealed. The pod is dark red, and sword-shaped, about seven inches long when perfect, and contains five of six seeds. When this tree blossomed at Wynyard in 1855 the racemes of flowers grew from the end of the large pinnate leaf, the peduncle forming a vermilion-coloured continuation of the petiolus. The growth is now different. The peduncle springs from the end of a branch, and is a pale green, about eighteen inches long, upon which grow half a dozen or more large flowers of about the diameter of a large coffee cup in the gape. The Marchioness has had the plant about four years.

KRAAL OF CHAKA, THE ZULU CHIEF.

THE ZULU KAFFIRS.

We have been favoured, says the Daily News, with a copy of the following letter from D'Urban, in South Africa, dated the 10th December, and giving a more particular narrative than has yet appeared of the ferocious warfare among the Zulu Kaffirs near Fort Natal :—

The Zulu tribes are now in a state of bloody revolution, and frightful scenes are enacted among the Kaffirs. Panda, one of the Zulus, has several grown-up sons, who have been casting covetous eyes on the inheritance. He is getting old and very fat, and unfit for war, and has repressed all the plans of the younger men against our Kaffirs. His immediate predecessors, Chaka and Dangaan, seeing that their Kings had always been murdered by their sons as the latter grew up, determined to anticipate any danger from that quarter by killing off their wives and concubines as soon as they were found pregnant. Panda, finding this course did not save either of the last two Kings a violent death, yielded in this respect to the voice of nature, and allowed his children to live. Such as the Kings and the chiefs, such are the people; and the acts above described are not different in their extent and degree from what is done continually among the Zulus of all classes.

Some pressure has been applied to Panda by his sons, whereby they have attained a division of territory, or have been appointed chiefs like others, but being dissatisfied and impatient, they have, without consulting the territory assigned them, they appealed to Panda. He told them to get it out. On Tuesday, Dec. 2, Imbulazi, his son or nephew, with a few of the old chiefs, was awaiting the arrival of Panda. Panda, however, the latter had succeeded in obtaining adherents from among the old chiefs to a much larger extent than was expected. When Cetuwaya's army appeared in sight of Imbulazi, the force of the former was so overpoweringly superior that the latter took to flight at once. They were stationed about seven miles from the Tugela, our boundary, and made for the river. The white young man, who had been acting with Imbulazi's army, was killed in the boat. Many were dispatched before they reached the river. Meanwhile a party was formed from among our people, under the eye of our Government agent stationed near the Tugela, Mr. Walmsley, son of Sir Joshua Walmsley, M.P., sixty of our Hottentot police, and volunteers from the native assistants of our hunters, agreed to cross the Tugela armed, under the superintendence of John Dunn, a young trader and Kaffir interpreter to Walmsley, for the purpose of endeavouring to stop the battle by parley. John Dunn was fired at, and narrowly escaped being shot. His party, however, on their volley, and the commanding Imbulazi's army were disciplined was sufficient to keep back the confused ranks of the savages But at last they perceived they were being surrounded, and were obliged to retreat, their arms were thrown away, and four or five returned across the Tugela. John Dunn only escaped by being mounted. The slaughter of the escaping Kaffirs was then carried on. A body of about 60 women and girls are now under the advocate into the river until they were nearly out of their depth, when they were assegaied by their ruthless pursuers. The river was literally dyed with blood. Numbers were drowned. Bodies have since been washed up in great numbers down the coast; we have heard of them south of us as far as the Umzimcane hundred miles from the Tugela), where they gave rise to reports of a shipwreck. Several canoes have come into our district and have been distributed among our natives. Bears are entertained about the supply of food for them. Our Kaffirs sympathise with the defeated, knowing that their fate would be their own if Cetuwaya could have his will. As soon as these affairs were reported, Mr. Shepstone, the Secretary for Native Affairs, repaired to the spot, and the Governor is now there.

For the town-dwellers there is no danger whatever; for the isolated settlers on the frontiers there may be some risks, but even theirs is only partial and uncertain.

It would seem a deal of bloodshed and ultimate expense if the British Government would send a military expedition at once, take possession of the country, setting up a chief under their protection, and limit his powers. It would save much in every way, and must come in the end A tower on the healthy high grounds on the borders of the Delagoa Bay would form a military depôt, and keep the Zulus in order.

We have engraved upon the preceding page three Views in Natal and the Zulu country, from sketches by Mr. James D. Ross.

Natal has been described as a long strip of country in South Africa, along the coast and inland as far as the Drakensberg, or Quathlumba Mountains, its port lying 1000 miles to the north-east of the Cape of Good Hope. Of this grand mountain feature the first of the Engravings presents a strikingly picturesque view. One of the smaller Engravings shows a point of the coast scenery; and the companion represents the Kraal of Chaka, the chief of the Zulus, who first received the English settlers in his territory. It is situated, with numerous other Kraals, on an extensive plain, encompassed by a chain of hills; the road thither from the Bay of Natal lying through beautiful country. This Kraal, as here represented, has the rustic character of an English homestead.

As one of the illustrations of the growing prosperity of the colony we may refer to an Engraving of the "Entrance of the First Sail-steamer into the Bay of Natal," in August, 1852 (See ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, No. 588). This was an event of promise which has been to a great extent realised.

In our Journal for Jan. 6, 1855, appeared a View of the principal street in the part of the colony D'Urban; and about a year later, Feb. 16, 1856) we illustrated the first Sale of Sugar in the Market-square of D'Urban, and gave a detailed account of the value of Natal as a New Sugar Colony.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1857.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL, as chief of the Whigs, has doubtless a very good Whig Reform Bill in his writing-desk. Lord Palmerston, as chief of a Ministry—that must be a Reform Ministry to a greater or less extent, or cease to exist—has doubtless formed a plan ideas or plans on the subject of Parliamentary Reform. But neither of these eminent personages has favoured the public with any positive information, either as to the scope, the spirit, or the details of his contemplated measure. Not so Mr. Disraeli. He also has a Reform Bill; and he, being unhampered either by the actual responsibilities of office, or the near prospect of having to bear them, has spoken boldly out, and told the electors of Buckinghamshire not only what he will but what he will not do as regards Parliamentary Reform. Mr. Disraeli considers that the Reform Act of 1832 was a one sided measure. It abolished the Tory rotten boroughs, but left the Whig rotten boroughs intact. For this bane Mr. Disraeli has found the antidote. He has doomed the Whig rotten boroughs to extinction; and Calne, Tavistock, Westbury, and a host of others, are to go the way of all rottenness, and to sleep with Gatton and Old Sarum. So far so good. But what Mr. Disraeli will not do is to propose, or consent to, the abolition of the distinction between counties and boroughs, and the division of the country into Electoral Districts. "Blot Buckinghamshire out of the political map?" "No!" says Mr. Disraeli. Rather than such a consummation as that, let Disraeli himself be blotted out of the roll of Parliament, and retire, like Cincinnatus, to the plough. To Mr. Disraeli Buckinghamshire is hallowed ground. Is not the author of "Coningsby" its representative? "My opinion," he says, "is that, the traditions of particular localities go to form part of the national character, and that a man who sees the road which Hampden ascended with the Petition of Rights is proud that he lives in a locality so intimately connected with the history of his country—that if you see a temple dedicated to the eloquence of Chatham at Stowe, you rejoice to find that the county of Buckingham is associated with so great a character, and that you cannot go to Beaconsfield, and view the oak under which Burke matured his reflections on the French Revolution, without entertaining a feeling of exultation that your county was the scene of meditations which so powerfully influenced the mind of Europe." Mr. Disraeli's modesty prevented him from adding, that since the days of Burke Buckingham had acquired a new lease of glory, and that the name of Disraeli had been added to those of Hampden, Chatham, and Burke, to make it excellent exceedingly, and surround it with imperishable lustre. If Mr. Disraeli—whose argument about the counties and against electoral districts we do not seek to controvert—would look into the future, he might, with his powers of imagination, conceive it a thing not altogether impossible or improbable that future ages might produce men to shed as much lustre on the department of the Upper Thames—at the bare mention of which he expresses so much horror—as the men of the past and of the present day have thrown upon the county of Bucks. But, leaving Mr. Disraeli to his poetic and romantic laments over the cruel catastrophe a system of Electoral Districts would inflict upon "Bucks," we never express our belief rather than our fear that he is not much of a Parliamentary Reformer. If he be not prepared to go a good deal further than the abolition of the Whig rotten boroughs, he might have spared himself the trouble of his declaration in favour of Reform. He has been largely outbidden by Sir Fitzroy Kelly, a member of his own party, who, not content with babbling about rotten boroughs, has expressed his willingness to extend the right of voting to everybody, whether he lives in a £10 house or not, who is possessed of property, of intellect, and of education. This is the movement that is required, and such a measure of Reform would be worth infinitely more than all that Mr. Disraeli has promised. But this part of the question is safe in the hands of Lord John Russell, where the country will be content to leave it until the proper time.

THERE is no such stranger amongst us during the week, taking notes of the evil doings. The author of the "Dame aux Camellias" has been dispatched from Paris to report on those phases of English popular and political life of which so much is heard, but so little is known, in Continental Europe—the life of a free people, engaged in choosing its representatives to sit in the greatest and most illustrious assembly in the world. The descriptions which M. Dumas will write will perhaps amuse the French—as they certainly do the English. Perhaps, also, his notes will be instructive as well as amusing to the people to whom they are more particularly addressed. If the French learn that large bodies of people, more or less excited by political feeling, may be trusted in this country to meet in public places without being cleared off the ground by a detachment of dragoons, or without even being watched by a military force in ambuscade; if they learn that the people themselves can shout and hurrah without thinking it incumbent upon them to break into the gunsmiths' shops—one lively neighbours will learn two things from the steadier English, which will tend to the improvement of their political education.

We remember some years ago having had a conversation with one of the greatest writers of France—still living, though his muse unhappily is silent—on the subject of our popular elections. "You English are a wonderful people," said he. "You meet in large numbers: ten thousand of you; twenty thousand of you:—fifty thousand of you. You elect a president, or chairman. You obey him as if he were your Emperor. You make speeches and express your indignation. You agree to resolutions. You hold up your hands—or canes, you cheer, you wave your hats, and then you go home quietly, as if nothing had happened. Why, if ten thousand men should meet together in a public place in Paris they would ask one another 'What are we here for? We are not here to speak, but to do!' Aux armes! aux armes!' And away they would go to the gunsmiths', and there would be an insurrection or a revolution. Happy England! wise Englishmen!"

With the exception of the disgraceful proceedings at Kidderminster, which were as exceptional as they were brutal, the elections just come and thoroughout the country might justify the eulogium of the straightforward Frenchman. Everything with the exception has been conducted with the greatest decorum and [illegible] by Mr. [illegible] ago, he would have had far more abundant material for comedy than for caricature. The prohibition of badges, banners, and bands of music, and of unstinted largess of beer and [illegible] tions of the picturesque yet vulgar element which novelists once delighted to portray. The possessors of votes are learning by degrees the importance of the trust, or the privilege which they possess. Even in small boroughs, where life is usually so stagnant, and where a little excitement may be considered a healthful novelty, the respectable householders become at each succeeding election more thoroughly aware of their dignity as electors, and go about the business with a grave sense of its importance both to their own localities, and to the general interests of the empire. The non-electors—who have no better means of testifying what they think or feel on such occasions than by gathering together in public, and cheering men with whose political sentiments they sympathize, and hooting those with whose opinions or party they disagree—have become, in consequence of the salutary absence of beer and banners, far more reasonable than they used to be, and afford fewer opportunities to the satirist. Let M. Dumas but truly represent to his readers the behaviour of an English crowd at the hustings, or at a public meeting during a contested election; let him depict the coarseness and the vulgarity if he will, but let him not forget the sturdy common sense and the genial though rough good humour of the crowd; and he will instil into the minds of his readers not only a love for free institutions, but a respect for the great people who almost alone in Europe have known how to guard the sacred fire of liberty, and to keep its flame brightly burning, as a guide to other nations. In this as in many other respects, whatever may be said in disparagement of our Government, or of our governing classes, the honest British people can stand the test. It is they who gain great battles on the field; and it is they who in the more peaceful conflicts of an Election, struggle in the cause of constitutional Liberty and Reform, and win the fight.

THE GENERAL ELECTION.

WILTS (SOUTH).

The nomination of candidates for the southern division of Wiltshire took place on Wednesday, at Salisbury. Three gentlemen were proposed to the electors. Mr. S. Herbert, Mr. Wyndham, and Lord Henry Thynne. In the last Parliament the division was represented by Mr. Herbert and Mr. Wyndham; and Lord Henry, who is brother of the Marquis of Bath, now presents himself for the first time to the constituency. He is a Conservative, and upholder of existing institutions in Church and State, and, it elected, will act with the party of Lord Derby. In his address he states that he comes forward in fulfilment of a pledge which he gave some time since, and it is generally understood, though neither he nor his friends have said so, that he aims at the seat lately occupied by Mr. Herbert. The contest between him and that gentleman is expected to be a very keen one. Both have been nothing in their exertions during the last fortnight to recommend themselves to the electors, by addressing public meetings and conducting a personal canvass in all parts of the division, and at present the ir friends appear to be equally sanguine of success. There are 2230 voters on the roll, and it is believed that nearly the whole of them will exercise their franchise this day (Saturday), which is fixed for the polling. The last time the division was contested upwards of 1500 votes were given for Mr. Herbert, but since then, as his opponents assert, he has lost the confidence of many of his former supporters.

The nomination took place on hustings erected at the Council-chamber, facing the market-place, one of the most spacious in England. The weather was favourable, and by eleven o'clock, the hour fixed for the commencement of the proceedings, several thousand persons had assembled to hear the speeches. A considerable number of them appeared to be agricultural labourers; but, though rather noisy at times, their conduct during the day was good humoured and orderly. A row of carriages, occupied chiefly by ladies, was drawn round the skirts of the crowd, and all the windows looking upon the market-place were filled with spectators. Mr. Wyndham arrived first at the hustings: he was accompanied by the members of his committee, and was well received by the people. Mr. S. Herbert followed, surrounded by a considerable number of his principal supporters, and was loudly cheered. Lord Henry Thynne, who was also well supported by his friends, was greeted with the cry of "No, no!" and some expressions of disapprobation. The usual preliminaries having been gone through, and Mr. Morrison, the High Sheriff, having craved a fair hearing for the speakers, the three candidates were proposed and seconded. Mr. Sidney Herbert devoted a portion of his speech to a defence of his conduct as a member of the Aberdeen Administration. He then diverted to the various questions which are likely to come before the new Parliament. He was not in favour of Mr. Locke King's motion, because he deemed it only a part of a great question. He wanted to see other ingredients mixed with it. "If you make the county and borough franchise the same you will disturb the balance between town and country. Such an arrangement would be unsatisfactory, because you might have 6000 men in a borough wielding equal political power with 30,000 in a county. You must, therefore, have different franchises. I wish to see an industrial franchise and a prudential franchise. I think a man who has £50 in the savings-bank ought to have a vote (Cheers). The man who pays 40s. of direct taxes ought also to be invested with the franchise, and all graduates of the University also should have the same right conferred upon them." Cheers. I am against extreme measures: universal suffrage for example, which I believe no man of sense in the country now demands; but with a large mass of our population increasing in intelligence and prosperity thanks to those wise measures of 1846 which our friends on the other side of the hustings so much regret (Cheers), I think we ought to enlarge the basis of representation (Hear, hear). But it should be carefully and deliberately. With a great crowd to manage, I would much sooner have them in a side the city to defend it than outside to attack it; but I must speak by men. I must choose the most intelligent, the most independent, the more prudent, and exclude the ignorant, the lazy, and the improvident."

When the show of hands was taken only three-fourths of the persons present held up their hands for Mr. S. Herbert; more than an equal number declared themselves in favour of Mr. Wyndham; while a comparatively small number only appeared for Lord H. Thynne. Mr. Phipps, for Lord Henry Thynne, demanded a poll, which was ordered to take place on Saturday (to days) between the hours of eight and five, at Salisbury, Warminster, Hindon, and Eversley.

SURREY (WEST).

The nomination of the candidates for the representation of this division of the county of Surrey in Parliament took place on Wednesday, at the Cornhall, Guildford. Mr. J. W. Evelyn, the high sheriff, proposed Mr. Henry Drummond, and Mr. G. Best seconded the nomination. Mr. L. Steere proposed Mr. Henry Currie, and Colonel Wood seconded the nomination. Lord Guildford was proposed by Colonel Challoner, and seconded by Mr. R. A. Austen.

Mr. Drummond made a lumonous speech, the most telling passage of which was the one relating to the Peelites, whom he accused of having combined with the Derbyites to turn out the Government: Those who [illegible] and [illegible] of [illegible] with [illegible] party [illegible] the House of Commons as Peelites a great many more than [illegible] very good speeches, but in whom he (Mr. Drummond) placed no confidence. By intelligence which has just been received by the steamer America, which arrived at Trieste on the 29th ult., we hear that a great victory over the Persians was gained by General Outram, at Khooshab, on the 8th of February. We give the details in another page.

By the courtesy of Major H. Ram, Paymaster of the Field Force in the Persian Gulf, we are enabled to present to our readers the five accompanying characteristic Groups of official personages and officers of the expedition and inhabitants of Bushire, photographed by Major Ram. Beneath each Illustration are inscribed the names of the respective parties.

To another officer belonging to the expeditionary force we are indebted for the two Views of Margill and Karrak, two important localities in the late intelligence from the seat of war with Persia.

MARGILL, THE RESIDENCE OF THE BRITISH CONSUL, NEAR BUSSORAH.

Margill, the residence of the British Consul, is three miles above Bussorah. In front of the residence lies the Honourable East India Company's armed steamer Comet, Captain Selby commanding. This small vessel, styled by the wild Arabs "the Swift Firefly," is literally armed to the teeth with offensive and defensive weapons, and is held in great terror by the predatory tribes of the coast.

The Island of Karrak, engraved upon the opposite page, is situated thirty miles W.N.W. of Bushire, and nineteen miles from the nearest point of the Persian coast. It surrendered on the 4th of December, with its dependency of Kergo, to a naval and military force, when, before the assembled inhabitants, a proclamation was read by Captain Disbrowe, Assistant Resident in the Persian Gulf, declaring Karrak to be a free port, and prohibiting slavery

THE ISLAND OF KARRAK, IN THE PERSIAN GULF.

The British colours were then hoisted under a salute of twenty-one guns. The accompanying View is from a Sketch by Mr. A. Harrison, Master, Indian Navy.

"Karrak, or Kharrak (the Icarus of Arrian), has an area of twelve or thirteen square miles, with a population of about 300 or 400. It affords a safe anchorage at all seasons, particularly during the severe gales which blow from the N.W., and are the prevailing winds in this sea. The greater part of the island is so rocky that little use can be made of it; but the east side, being somewhat lower than the other parts, is capable of being cultivated. It has abundance of water. The inhabitants gain a livelihood by gardening and fishing, and manufacture a small quantity of common cloth for their own consumption. The island of Kergo, lying about a mile and quarter or two miles north of Karrak, contains about two square miles, and is of a light sandy soil. It has also plenty of water, but not of so good a quality as that of Karrak, and, although not inhabited at present, it is capable of being cultivated, and will produce both wheat and barley during the rainy season.

Pearls of a superior colour and description are fished around the coasts of both islands. The Dutch, after having been obliged to abandon their factory at Bassorah, founded an establishment at Karrak in 1748. They were, however, driven from it by the Arabs about 1765. Karrak was subsequently occupied by the Persians, and in 1807, for a short period, by the French. During our recent disagreement with the Shah of Persia, the British Resident, previously stationed at Bushire, removed thither, and the island was taken possession of by an English force in 1839. Its acquisition will give us the complete command of the Persian Gulf, and will be also serviceable from its affording a secure anchorage for our ships and a station where they may water and refit.

COMMODORE ST. JERSAY, COMMANDING PERSIAN GULF SQUADRON. CAPT. JONES, RESIDENT AT BUSHIRE. NATIVE ATTENDANTS AND GUARD.

COURTYARD OF THE BRITISH RESIDENCY, BUSHIRE.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.

The author of "From Bombay to Bushire," just published, observes "that all firewood and provision must be obtained from the Main, with the exception of such goats and sheep as the small island of Kergo, in close proximity, can afford. The commissariat might be well supplied from the Arabian coast—that portion of it under the Turkish Government, at the entrance of the Bussorah River—where cattle, sheep, and corn are to be had in abundance, and cheaply; and might easily be carried thence by the small steamers of the Indian Navy."

An officer of the Ahmednuggur Brigade has favoured us with the Portraits of three distinguished Persian noblemen, at present prisoners of war at that station.

The first is well known in Ahmednuggur by the sobriquet of "Palmerston." He is a distinguished diplomatist, and the "Elcher" sent down to Bushire by his Majesty the Shah to raise and excite the itinerant tribes on the seaboard and highlands to resist the English invasion. His polished manners, finished address, and courteous bearing, show that he is a man of mark in his own country, and well acquainted with the customs of Europeans and the habits of civilised life.

Next is the Commander-in-Chief of the Shah's Army on the Southern Coast of Persia, and a near relative of his Majesty.

The third personage—surnamed the Duria-Biggur, or "Lord of the Seas"—was the Persian Governor of Bushire and its dependencies, who struck his flag and resigned his marine title.

These three portraits are from ably-executed photographs just received from the Persian Gulf.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE steadily-increasing Liberal majority, the triumph of Lord John Russell in the City, the extirpation of the peace-mongers from Parliament, and the savage riot at Kidderminster, are the principal features in the general election thus far. The most obstinate of the China men cannot now refuse to admit that Lord Palmerston, so far from having received a "fall" (as exultingly announced by the "cheap" press), has thrown all his opponents, and returns in triumph to the House at the head of a party which will both urge and enable him to take such a course, not only in foreign negotiation, but in domestic legislation, as befits the Prime Minister of England. The Disraelite taunt that the Cabinet has no policy will henceforth be permitted no justification in facts. Wisely-considered but evident progress must now be the watchword of the Palmerston Cabinet. A factious Opposition is crippled, and Lord Palmerston can now show his sincerity as a Liberal.

The victory in the City must be gratifying to all men who respect independence, no matter their party. A knot of gentlemen who have rendered service in their time, by promoting organisation, conceived themselves entitled to dictate to upwards of 20,000 electors not only that they must choose none but mercantile men, but also the names of the men to be chosen. Lord John Russell, with his habitual courage, opposed himself to such despotism, and the citizens have thrown out the candidate imposed upon them, and placed Lord John second to the Hebrew gentleman whose wealth and influence are all but omnipotent in the City. The excuses which the defeated party have since been offering, through their chief, Mr. Dillon, may be overlooked in consideration of the disappointment they record. They appear to have desired to treat Lord John as an uncivil tradesman might treat a hesitating customer: "Take it, or leave it, then; but make up your mind at once!" Lord John had no idea of being so bullied, and made up his mind at his own time, and, as it has turned out, very little to the satisfaction of the member-making Warwicks of the E.C. district.

Cobden, Bright, Milner Gibson, W. J. Fox, Joshua Walmsley—all extruded at once. Such a sacrifice to the manes of a suicide Parliament could hardly have been looked for; and its angry ghost must be not only appeased, but exultant, and take a longer stride, like the shade of Achilles when he heard of the glory of his son. But no truly Liberal politician can derive unmixed pleasure from these elections. Mr Bright was the manliest speaker in the House, and was young enough to be cured of the prejudices arising from a narrow education, and the adulation of a provincial clique. Mr. Cobden has done too good service to be eashiered for recent blunders. We shall hope to see them back again, the wiser for a lesson as to the real feeling of Englishmen about England a thing which, somehow, the non-hostiles do not understand so well even as some of the old Conservatives. For the loss of the other three constellations the country must console itself, especially as Messrs. Gibson and Fox have organs of their own, and as the opinions of Sir J. Walmsley upon any subject are not of that exceeding weight as to make it exactly necessary to post before public business until he shall have made utterance. General Thompson, moreover, earth all three as a courageous and veteran Reformer, has been seated for Bradford, and the exchange is decidedly in favour of Liberalism.

Mr. Frederick Peel and Admiral Berkeley have been defeated. Incidents which may occasion some inconvenience to the Government, but a seat will be found for the civilian, and as the chief business of the Admiral was to say most offensive things in a warlike tone, somebody else may be found to possess that accomplishment. Perhaps his victorious enemy, Sir C. Napier, would kindly undertake the part in the absence of his late castigator. Poor Mr Pellatt, who had retired, was dragged out to be beaten. He bore it mildly; but Mr. Wilkinson, defeated in Lambeth by a real hier Liberal, unhesitatingly apprised his late idolators that they were a set whose approbation was not worth having, that they had elected Mr. Roupell because he was a new man and rich, and, however faithfully he might serve them the next new man, if richer, would beat Mr. Roupell. Mr. Thomas Duncombe is again triumphantly returned for Finsbury: and with him, but longo intervallo, Mr. Cox—whom the next gentleman on the poll Mr. Serjeant Parry pledges himself to expel for bribery.

An announcement that Mr. Fitzroy had withdrawn all intention of being nominated for the Speaker-ship has been authoritatively contradicted. This would make it appear that the Ministerial party intend to start that gentleman, in opposition to Mr. Walpole, who have, no doubt, strength to carry the election, if they please, but may be too much to expect a triumphant party meeting for their first time, to concede to their opponents the appointment of the occupant of so distinguished a post as the Speaker's chair. At the same time, Mr. Walpole possesses every qualification for the office; and, though Mr. Fitzroy is an aristocrat by birth being son and heir presumptive to Lord Southampton. Mr. Walpole has what we may call a House of Commons pedigree—he is great-grandson of Sir Robert Walpole.

The foreign mails bring little of interest from the Emperor of Continent, unless the squabbles of the Princes of the Legitimist and Orleans houses may be regarded as worthy of note. The "fusion" cannot be consummated, the representatives of Charles X. adhering to their rights and those of Louis Philippe to their treaties. The latter is evidently the best bid for the throne of France, but its present occupant is by no means desirous of parting with it, and has no intention of abdicating it for any pretension. M. Alexandre Dumas has commenced the publication of certain letters which he declares to be letters of the Prince, several startling novels founded upon modern history. Mr. Disraeli and Mademoiselle de Rothschild are both married Guido Fawkes has been dead some years, and Magna Charta is not passed annually, like the Mutiny Bill: but we hope that trifling considerations like these will not prevent M. Dumas from giving a charming feuilleton novel of English election life, in which the attachment of the leader of Opposition for the heiress of the Rothschild millions is played off against the patriotism of the framer of the Gunpowder Plot, who consents not to blow up the Parliament, and to unite the lovers, conditionally on the Charter being passed—which it is, by one vote given by the Baron de Rothschild, on taking his doctoral seat in the House of Lords.

PROPOSED MEMORIAL TO THE LATE JOHN BRITTON.—The subscription at the Institute of Architects is making gradual progress towards the amount contemplated, £100, and the committee have determined that their tribute shall take the shape of an inscribed brass plate in Salisbury Cathedral, the desk and chapter having readily consented to allow it to be set up there. Some of Mr Britton's friends are anxious to give the memorial a more important character, such as the restoration of the Lady Chapel; and Mr. John Britton, F.R.S., Mr. Cubitt, Mr. Hardwick, Mr Alderman Proctor of Bristol, and others, have agreed to their names to subscribe for such a purpose, for which about £50 more will be required. The Institute committee have expressed a wish that their willingness to allow their mutilated brass to be combined with this restoration, if it can be effected, and contributions towards it whatever might remain from their subscription, after paying for the plate. As a centre is needed, so that the good desires of the friends of Mr Britton may be realised, we venture to state that communications on the subject may be addressed to Mr. Nathaniel Gould, 4, Tavistock-square, or Mr. G. Godwin, Brompton.

On Monday her Majesty honoured the Haymarket Theatre with her presence. The Prince Consort and the Princess Royal accompanied her Majesty.

On Tuesday the Queen received at dinner the Princess of Hohenlohe Langenburg, Viscount and Viscountess Sydney, Viscount Eversley (the late Speaker) and his lady.

On Wednesday her Majesty again had a dinner party, at which the Russell family attended at the Palace, and had the honour of performing before the Queen and the Prince

After dinner her Majesty received a select circle of visitors.

Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston arrived in town on Wednesday from Torquay.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE second day at Northampton was full of incident. Three sons of Womersley, whose star seems rising, finished first, second, and third in the Cup. Emydine, a 75-guinea purchase of Mr. R. Sutton at the Royal sale, won the Althorp Park Stakes, in which the 9 lb. difference told on Happy Land, one of the slow and sure Jericho sort; and Gemma di Vergy beat St. Giles, who had had quite enough of it in the long race the day before, cleverly, over a mile. The injury to Alfred Day's toe will, we hear, prevent him from riding for some time, and thus throw many Danebury mounts into Sam Rogers's or George Mann's hands. Quinton's exposure has caused not a little talk. He had recently joined hurdle-racing and steeplechasing to flat riding. In the latter he has had great support, as he won 31 out of 212 mounts last season; and many of the ring always made a special point of backing him, without even looking at the horse. Alas for misplaced confidence! Lord Spencer's yearlings only averaged 75 guineas, as the Newcourt blood is small and unfashionable, and buyers do not care to take risk on themselves so early in the year. Old Melbourne mares this season. Fisherman, it is said, will not improbably pass into Lord Londesborough's hands for 3000 guineas; but Fandango ought to keep him safe for the Ascot Cup. There was little doing at Croxton Park, and "Mr Clarke" only rode twice. Hunting Horn, the expensive brother to St. Hubert, was last from end to end in his maiden race; the once much-vaunted Sir Colin being a bad second to Glede Hawk. Fazzoletto is in training for Beechnut is said to be blind of an eye: Saunterer has been a little off, but is in good work again: Vedette (whose noble owner is better again) has been tried to give a great deal of weight to Skirmisher; and Blink Bonny is going well, and rests under the daily and nightly surveillance of a bloodhound. It is thought that H. Robertson will ride her. The next week is a blank as regards racing, and there will merely be steeplechases at Newcastle-on-Tyne and Knighton (Radnorshire) on Wednesday.

Hunting is nearly told out, and talks of new arrangements for the 1857-58 season are rife. Mr. Davis goes back to the Bicester country, and will, we conclude, claim the Cottesmore hounds, according to his contract. The Southwold Hunt has a £100 subscription certain for three years and new kennels are to be built at Tedford. Captains Fox and Dallas are to manage, and Jack Morgan and his brother Tom, at present the first-second whips to Lord Henry Bentinck, are to be the new huntsman and whip. Jack Goddard wound up with the Shropshire last Friday; and is, we believe, like Will Long, in want of a huntsman's place. Will Maiden (Joe Maiden's eldest son), who has been a whip for seven years under his father, Stephen Goodall, &c., are also looking out for a huntsman's or whip's berth. It has been determined to go on with Mr. Davis's testimonial, which has been headed by the Earl of Bessborough, and a fair sum has been at present collected from the sportsmen of two generations. Messrs. Fores, of Piccadilly, keep the lists. The Cheshire difficulty becomes more complicated by the mode in which the farmers' tenants of the M.F.H. committee, whose rejoinder is of a most crushing character, both on the point of his being warned off the best part of the country, and having had full notice to forward to them the necessary documents on which to base their decision. The list of those who have warned him off includes the Marquis of Westminster, Lord Crewe, Lord Delamere, Mr Egerton, Mr. Tomkinson, and others who own the very best covers in the county. It seems, from an incidental remark in the judgment, that the season is considered to have been a good one everywhere.

Mr. Tailby's hounds had a tremendous run from Keythorpe on the 26th of March, eleven miles in fifty-five minutes, and over-running their fox, who lay down dead beat at last. On Friday Lord Stamford's had a splendid 3h. 50m. run from Nuthills, changing foxes, and killing their fifty-eighth fox off at Grimston Gorse on account of a vixen being in cub. Mr Coleman is much on in the saddle, and went in the front rank in both of these runs. On Monday afternoon these hounds had another good thing from Lord Aylesford's covert, and killed below Nickley. There are flying rumours that Sir G. Wombwell and the Hon. Mr. Craven will take the Cottesmore country next season; and Mr. Tailby, who has done such wonders with his scratch pack, has bought, it is said, ten couples of the present hounds.

The Oxford and Cambridge boat race takes place this day, about eleven, from Putney to Mortlake. The former crew average 11 st. 2 lb., and the latter 11 st. 7 lb. The Prince of Wales Yacht Club have their opening trip from Folly House on Thursday, at half-past three; and the Marylebone Cricket Club pitch the first wickets of the season at Cumbridge on May 21.

The officers were about to renounce the search in despair, when one of them perceived that the statue of the saint was not placed evenly on its base. That circumstance led to a closer examination, and it was then found that the statue could be displaced at pleasure; and that underneath was a large cavity, in which 200 lb. weight of tobacco was found. When this hiding-place was made is not known. French Paper.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

The study of English history and of British antiquities has suffered a severe loss in the early and unexpected death of John Mitchell Kemble. Mr. Kemble brought to his many labours of love a quick, sagacious mind, and a determination of purpose rarely found united in the same person. Deeply learned and all-accomplished as he was, he did not overlay his learning, but had the enviable skill of setting forth his researches with the graces of a good style. Better still, though he swept with a drag-net great and small, he soon enlarged his meshes, and suffered the small to retain anywhere. He knew what to use and how to use it. His was a memory particularly remarkable for its powers of reference. He could direct others with a precision that many have envied. His "Saxons in England" has strengthened the literary reputation of England in distant countries. What his new book would have been—his "Horæ Feralæ; or, Studies in the Archæology of Northern Nations"—it is easy to surmise. What the Art-Treasures Exhibition in Manchester has lost by his death cannot be supplied. His many friends regret that his papers have been left in a state too scattered for any one to turn them to full account. Barely six weeks ago the writer of this brief notice parted with his friend after a day of delightful talk with with him over the Meyrick acquisitions to the Manchester Exhibition. On that day Kemble started for Dublin—an important stronghold in the archæology of the northern nations. He was full of hope, earnest, richly communicative, and certainly most eloquent. On Saturday last he was buried in the Mount Jerome Cemetery at Dublin. Mr. Petrie, of the Round Towers, and all the eminent antiquaries in Dublin, heard the last word which "dust to dust" conveyed. All that ceaseless skill could do to preserve his life, and all that wise attention could display in doing honour to his remains, was done by the intelligence of Dublin, and the unobtrusive but useful activity of the Committee of the Art-Treasures Exhibition.

Dramatic authors and actors are alive asking who is to succeed Mr. Kemble in his office of Examiner of Plays. The office was created more than a century ago, through the severity of Fielding's satire, and the activity and determination of Sir Robert Walpole. The situation is in the gift of the Lord Chamberlain for the time being; and the duty of the licenser is to expunge all profanity, and all political and personal references likely to excite and to mislead. Dramatic authors and actors are not over-fond of the Examiner. He is at times a little tyrant in his own way, and expunges with an unsparing pen. The office of Examiner is one for which Mr. Kemble was in every respect unfitted. He obtained the appointment in this way: at the death of the younger Coleman, the then Lord Chamberlain gave the place to Charles Kemble, the celebrated actor; after a short period, Kemble was suffered to resign in favour of his son. This privilege created an outcry at the time, and the Lord Chamberlain was made to hear some angry and not inapplicable remarks upon the subject. Saxon Kemble did the work by deputy, and that deputy (a Mr. Downe) will, it is said, succeed to the appointment. We hope not, while such writers for the stage as Mr. Jerrold, Mr. Planché, Mr. Charles Dance, and Mr. Sheridan Knowles are still alive. The office of Poet-Laureate (also in the gift of the Lord Chamberlain) is held by our best living poet. The office of Examiner of Plays be held by our best living dramatist? No claim—not even that of Sir Edward Bulwer—could be urged in point of merit alone against the writers we have named.

The Society of Antiquaries is about and stirring—even Mr. Roach Smith is not so active as Mr. Akerman. The ancient church at Dover thanks to the exertions of the Somerset House antiquaries, is to be spared. Lord Panmure is not in a mood at present for demolishing the ruins of the ancient church at Dover. But why antiquaries ask—have the inhabitants of Dover been so seemingly indifferent on the subject?

Messrs. Christie and Manson have work before them: Alton Towers is to supply a thirty-one days' sale. Read what follows. Here, indeed, is a heavy task for the hammer of the auctioneer:

The Magnificent Contents of Alton Towers. Messrs. Christie and Manson respectfully give notice, that they have received Instructions from the executors and trustees of the late Bertram Arthur Earl of Shrewsbury, to sell, by auction, at the Towers, on Monday, July 6th, and thirty following days the whole of the magnificent and costly effects in Alton Tower, the princely seat of the late Right Honourable the Earl of Shrewsbury, comprising the celebrated gallery of pictures by old masters, [illegible] sculpture, china, carvings, and works of mediæval art; the very important collection of armour, [illegible] the service of silver and silver-gilt plate; cellar of wines; the whole of the magnificent ancient Tudor and beautiful modern furniture, and the sculpture and ornaments in the garden. Full details of this most important sale will be duly given.

Here, then, is another opportunity for the Marquis of Hertford to open his princely purse and display his fine taste. What an advertisement would George Robins have made of Alton Towers!

The National Portrait Gallery Commission has made another purchase and, we learn, a welcome one a portrait of Handel, by Hudson. We suppose the Commissioners are aware that the finest portrait of Handel also by Hudson—is the full-length at Gopsal, the seat in Leicestershire of Lord Howe. It hangs in the room in which Handel composed the "Messiah." Lord Howe has most liberally lent this picture to the Art-Treasures Exhibition of the United Kingdom.

We notice only to contradict a saying generally attributed to the spirited lessee of Drury-lane Theatre. Mr. E. T Smith stood last week for Bedford. When Mr. Smith was asked (so the story runs) why he was anxious to be in Parliament, he is said to have replied, "Why not? My predecessor was in Parliament." The saying, of course, refers to Sheridan.

Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson have not lost any of the well known skill in obtaining high prices for good books and bright bindings. At Mr. Utterson's sale last week Mr. Toovey of Toovey and Toovey, and yet the prices were not [illegible] high, the condition of the books, the leather and the look being perfect in every way.

We have seen this week an exquisite specimen of the Benvenuto Cellini art of the present day. It is a trowel, made by Phillips, of Cockspur-street, for presentation to the Chairman of the Art-Treasures Exhibition. The handle is a model of artistic excellence. Designer is Mr. Young, the contractor for the building [illegible] Mr. Thomas Fairbairn. It is engraved at page 314.

ADAMS'S ORRERY AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.—[illegible] out next week [illegible] exception [illegible] Adams will deliver [illegible] on Astronomy [illegible] transparent moving scenery of the [illegible] phenomena of our System—for which class of illustrations the Haymarket Theatre is [illegible] Mr Adams has of late years presented [illegible] lecture at the Theatre, which has this year been secured by [illegible] his popular entertainment during Passion-week.

M. Emile Augier, the dramatic author, was elected a member of the French Academy, on Monday last, by a majority of one. His competitor was M. Victor de Laprade, also a poet, though not generally known. The contest was a warm one between the two, and a ballot took place twice.

MUSIC.

THE TONIC SOL-FA ASSOCIATION had a great choral meeting at Exeter Hall on Tuesday evening. There was a vast assemblage, and the proceedings were of no ordinary interest. We have more than once directed the attention of our musical readers to this association, and to the peculiar system of vocal instruction for the propagation of which it was established, and, we believe, matured by the Rev. Mr. Curwen, of Plaistow, in Essex, a devoted labourer in the vineyard of popular education. It is founded on the once celebrated, but now forgotten, method of Jean Jacques Rousseau; but Rousseau's principle has been developed and applied to practice in a manner of which he himself had no idea. Like Rousseau's notation, Mr. Curwen's indicates, not the absolute pitch of a sound, but its pitch relatively to the key, or scale, to which it belongs, so that a melody or piece of music is always noted in the same way, whatever may be the key or pitch in which it is to be sung. For the notes of the scale Rousseau used the Arabic numerals; Mr. Curwen uses the initial letters of the syllables doe, ray, me, &c., employed in solfeing. And the syllables, together with a few additional marks to express time, rest, and flats and sharps, the relative lengths of their notes, and their rhythmical division into bars constitute the whole of Mr Curwen's musical characters. They do not in any part unite of [illegible] in any way; they are in fact written with a letter, and are so simple that even a child can learn them in a few lessons. This method, it is proper to add, is not intended to supersede the established system of musical notation, and its uses are confined to vocal music of a comparatively simple kind—an explanation necessary to dispel prepossessions which might otherwise be entertained against it.

At Exeter Hall, on Tuesday evening, there was a vocal choir, formed by the pupils of the various metropolitan schools, and numbering 800 voices. The choir was taken by Mr. Hickson—a gentleman well known by his works on popular education, and, under his direction, a quantity of very fine choral music was admirably sung, without the aid of any instrumental accompaniment whatever. The selection included choruses, glees, part-songs, and hymns, by Mendelssohn, Stevens, Webbe, Spofforth, and other classical composers; many of them not a little complicated and difficult; yet they were executed by the choir of voices with a precision, smoothness, expression, and truthful effect which called forth acclamations of pleasure from the immense auditory. In the course of the evening Mr. Curwen delivered a brief lecture, explaining, in a general way, but very lucidly, the principles of his method, and the manner of teaching used in the schools. His address—which he pleasantly illustrated by requesting the audience to put themselves in the place of pupils and practise with him some of his lessons was received with the utmost cordiality; and he concluded amid the vehement cheers of the meeting.

SACRED CONCERTS IN LINCOLNSHIRE.—During the last week Rossini's "Stabat Mater," the gems from Costa's "Eli," and a miscellaneous selection, have been presented in Boston, Lincoln, Louth, Spalding, and Spilsby, to numerous audiences. The artistes were Misses Rudersdorff, Mdme Amadei, Messrs. C. Braham, A. Irving, Sig Randegger, and Mr. L. Thirlwall. Music of so high a class is a perfect novelty in this county, and it was gratifying to state that it was fully appreciated. The singing was perfect, and the accompaniment (by Randegger and Mr. Thirlwall (piano and harmonium) worthy of the vocalists. At Boston, where the performances were, on Friday, [illegible] Mr Braham [illegible] and W H Adams, Esq., the newly-appointed [illegible] was well brilliantly. The "Stabat Mater" [illegible] on Thursday, at Louth, owing [illegible] the illness of Mdme Amadei's [illegible] but the extensive [illegible] was of much interest. Miss Rudersdorff (Mrs Mantell) has been a pupil of Mr. F. Cox, to whom she made a present at the end of the programme, and sang Wallace's ballad, "The Star of Love," in a style which secured for her an enthusiastic encore. She has a fine voice, and exhibited considerable taste. Throughout the tour a lively vocal tour de force, "Guarda o Caro," composed for, and sung by Mdme. Rudersdorff (by Sig Randegger), has been a certain [illegible] The extension of musical taste in Lincolnshire is mainly attributable to the establishment of popular concerts at Boston, where the principle of high-class talent and low-class prices has been carried out with great success.

THE CONCERT of the MUSICAL UNION, on Tuesday evening, derived a special interest from a new trio for the pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by M. Saks. It was most admirably executed by Messrs. Hallé, Ernst, and Piatti; and its originality and beauty delighted the [illegible] audience. Another interesting performance was Mozart's tenth Quartet in D, a charming work, which has been too seldom heard. Some doubts were even entertained at one time as to its genuineness; but they have long since been set at rest, and, indeed, every one who has ears to hear must feel that this quartet, from beginning to end, breathes the very spirit of Mozart.

THE NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY gave their first concert this season at the Hanover-square Rooms on Wednesday evening. It was [illegible] of concert. Beethoven's "Sinfonia Eroica" was magnificently executed under the direction of Dr. Wylde; and Mendelssohn's fine Pianoforte [illegible] in G minor was admirably performed by the excellent young pianist Mr Barnett. The only novelty was a "Serenade" for wind instruments, by Mozart; a pleasing long since forgotten, and now [illegible] discovered toy some German amateur. It is thus [illegible] bears the impress of Mozart [illegible] more; besides, [illegible] which himself seems to have thought worthy of preservation. The room, though not crowded, was well filled.

MONDAY EVENING CONCERTS FOR THE PEOPLE.—On Monday evening next, the 6th inst., the Lord Mayor will pay a state visit to these popular Concerts at St. Martin's Hall. His Lordship will be accompanied by the Lady Mayoress, the Sheriffs and Under-Sheriffs, and several noblemen and other distinguished personages. On this occasion a miscellaneous performance of sacred music will be given, supported by Miss Birch, Miss Augusta Manning, Madame Bassano, Miss Clara Mackenzie, Mr. Dawson Mr Sims Reeves, Mr. Wallworth, and the London Vocal Union.

THE THEATRES, &c.

HER MAJESTY'S.—The close of the elections will be followed by the [illegible] Majesty's Theatre, on Tuesday, the 14th April [illegible] musical performance will be Donizetti's opera of "La Favorita," in which Spezia and Guiglini have taken by storm the connoisseurs of the Imperial Court of Austria during its recent sojourn at Milan. Mdlle Pecchini will also make her début on the opening night [illegible] part for Terpsichorean fame, and, with a courage which is seldom fully justified by her beauty and accomplishments, will [illegible] her first appearance the interesting character of La Zingara. [illegible] announced that [illegible] upon as late as the full that it is to afford the general public an opportunity of witnessing the extraordinary [illegible] with which the season will commence, it has been found necessary to repeat the same programme for the second night, which will be an open Thursday. The metropolis will thus provide for Tuesday and Friday. Harmony in the Temple of Music will temper the discords that are apt to arise in the Hall of the Legislature; and the [illegible] of the Queen of Her Majesty's Theatre all parties will find [illegible] round which [illegible] opinion may be for a time [illegible] Church and War-men, will yield to [illegible] Spezia, if we may judge by the [illegible] have been made for the campaign, seem likely [illegible] sible than has existed [illegible] years.

THEATRE. Antonio Guiglini whose advent in England is [illegible] the metropolitan [illegible] audiences, and his appearance in "La Favorita" will afford to untravelled Englishmen their first opportunity of [illegible] to the voice which has charmed every ear in Italy. Guiglini was originally destined for the stage. His earliest public performances were in the choir of the metropolitan church of Fermo, where [illegible] and afterwards as a tenor—he attracted the [illegible] as by his perfect vocalisation and expression no [illegible] by the purity and sweetness of his voice. The constant practice of the highest class of music gave to the young tenor the elevation of style which is essential to the highest dramatic success, and yet is seldom acquired by a purely theatrical training. For some time Guiglini resisted all the offers which were made to tempt him to the stage, and the direction of his talents to opera was at last given by a happy accident. A member of the orchestra at the theatre of Fermo fell ill at the most critical period of the season, and Guiglini was [illegible] to supply his place at a moment's notice. Scarcely was he established within the walls of the theatre when fate provided another occasion for the display of his peculiar powers. The tenor was unable to appear, and the manager was so urgent on Guiglini to come to his aid that the hesitation of the young artist was at length overcome, and, without any previous preparation, he assumed the tenor part in "I Due Foscari," and acquitted himself with so much success that from that evening he was recognised as the principal tenor of the establishment. Once placed in the situation for which nature intended him, his career became a continued ovation, and all the theatres of Italy are ringing with the renown of Antonio Guiglini. His last and greatest triumph was won at the [illegible] in Milan, where his performances in "La Favorita," and other parts, so gratified the Emperor, that Guiglini was at once nominated Chamber Singer at the Court of Vienna, and the most strenuous efforts were made to secure his services at the Viennese Opera. Fortunately for us Mr. Lumley had been beforehand in the market, and had made an engagement with Guiglini for three years, which he was not disposed to give up for any consideration which the Court of Vienna could offer. Guiglini was immediately retained to perform at the Imperial Theatre in the season of 1850, after the termination of his English engagement. The frequenters of Her Majesty's Theatre will soon have an opportunity of judging of this eminent artist, who will appear, together with Mdlle. Spezia, in the same opera in which they first established their reputation with the brilliant Court of Austria.

AT a later period than usual Mr Gye has now put forth the programme of his arrangements for the ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. The delay has doubtless been caused by the difficulties he has had to encounter in finding a domicile for his immense establishment. He had, it is understood, concluded a treaty for the lease of Drury-lane Theatre, but was forced to relinquish it by the manner in which [illegible] insisted on their claims. He has thus been compelled to take refuge once more in the Lyceum—a place entirely unsuited to him; but it would appear he has had no choice. He makes the best of a bad bargain, however, and speaks of the almost universal approval of the performances last season—"many subscribers, indeed, [illegible] preferring the smaller theatre, on account of the facility in seeing and hearing the entertainments, as well as for the elegance and exclusiveness of the audience." He trusts, however (he adds), "that for the season 1858 he will be able to restore to the Royal Italian Opera a house second to none, if not superior to that of which it has been deprived." We shall be very glad to find that in indulging this hope Mr. Gye is not building a château en Espagne.

The subscription of his [illegible] may be comprised in a small compass. He is to open his theatre on the 11th of this month—the same evening with Her Majesty's Theatre; and the subscription is to be for forty nights. The company will be as strong as ever, including all the great names of last year, together with several others, [illegible] in particular, whose name is a tower of strength, is to reappear; and two debuts of great interest are announced. The first [illegible] Victorine Saba, the daughter of our distinguished composer, a young lady said to be possessed of great attainments and [illegible] powers who have been assiduously cultivated and [illegible] the other is that of Mdlle. Dacrya, who, however, is a [illegible] this country; for though very young she has already gained a great reputation in several of the principal theatres of Italy.

Mr. Gye promises very little [illegible] the [illegible] of the new [illegible] operatic novelty. The only thing that can be [illegible] is a new version in Italian version, and with new recitatives and additional poetry and music, written expressly for the Royal Italian Opera. We have not much faith in such transformations, and cannot help thinking that taking for the soggetto of the Opera a piece [illegible] of sparkling, and exquisitely French, and [illegible] it with [illegible] dialogue, sing-song recitative, and all the pomp and [illegible] of the Italian stage, is not a very hopeful experiment. [illegible] Matrimonio Segreto" [illegible] Cimarosa's "Matrimonio Segreto" [illegible] Nozze di Figaro" Heroic "Zampa," and Mercadante's "Giramento." These are pleasant announcements; the two masterpieces of Cimarosa and Mozart are the finest comic operas in the world; and the "Matrimonio" contains the most genial and delightful of all Lablache's characters. We [illegible] have the "Traviata" of [illegible] Bosio, who it seems has had [illegible] success in this opera at St Petersburgh, will contend for the palm with the fascinating Tournaire of the other house.

Costa resumes his post at the head of the orchestra, and [illegible] Maggioni holds the situation of poet—a position which in all [illegible] theatre is not much more than nominal. The Royal Italian Opera during its whole career has been much indebted to Signor Maggioni for his excellent poetical versions of the great operas of Meyerbeer and other French and German pieces which this theatre has produced.

The Ballet has never been a great feature of the Royal Italian Opera. The only known names announced in this department are Mdlle. Otto and Mdlle Plunkett. No male dancers at all are mentioned in the which we infer that the regular dramatic ballet will not be attempted, but that the enter[illegible]nts of this class will be limited to [illegible] pas seuls.

OLYMPIC.—The tragic power of Mr. Robson has been long suspected, but hitherto it has only been permitted to [illegible] in [illegible] burlesque and low comedy. RESCUE OF CAPT. BAKER AND A SEAMAN BY THE ROYAL MAIL STEAMER "ENGLAND."

RESCUE AT SEA.

We have been favoured with the accompanying Sketch by a Correspondent who was one of the passengers by the mail steamer England, and an eye-witness of the incident here represented. The circumstances are thus narrated before the American Consul at Cape Town by Archelaus Baker, who stated that he was late master of the whaling barque Henry H. Crape, of Dartmouth, State of Massachusetts, U. S.; that on the 11th of January last he sailed in the above vessel from St Augustine's Bay, Island of Madagascar, with 900 barrels of sperm oil, bound to Dartmouth; and that on the 19th, in lat. 32 deg. 30 min. south, long. 32 deg 30 min. east, at seven p.m., while steering S.W. by W., with a light breeze from the N.N.E., he saw a squall arising from the S.W.; took in all light sails, rigged in studding-sail booms. At nine p.m. the squall passed over to the S.E., and soon after a calm—he clewed down topsails, hauled out reef-tackles, and hauled up courses. About a quarter past nine p.m. a light breeze sprung up from the southward—he double-reefed fore-topsail and furled the mainsail, clewed up the foretopsail, and, while the men were in the act of furling it, a heavy gust from the southward struck the ship, which capsized her, and she immediately filled. He then ordered the lanyards of the rigging to be cut away, and the boat from the larboard side to be launched; but it, being stove, filled, and, while he was in the act of cutting the lanyards of the main-rigging, he was washed overboard. After several fruitless attempts to regain his ship, he succeeded in reaching a small piece of a boat and a cutting-stage. With the lanyard belonging to the cutting-stage he secured the two together, and upon this precarious stage, or raft, he remained until daylight, when not a vestige of the vessel could be seen nothing on the face of the water was discoverable but some driftwood. About seven a.m. he was suddenly aroused by the sound of a human voice which proceeded from one of his crew, a Sandwich Islander, who was at the time floating upon four oars and a piece of board. After several attempts they succeeded in reaching each other. They then, with all the materials they could get, constructed a more substantial raft. Through the course of the day of the 20th January they picked up two more oars, and a small piece of plank, with a few fathoms of rope attached, with which they strengthened their raft. On the following day they picked up another oar and three pumpkins; the latter was the first food they had eaten since the disaster. It should be stated that in the part of a boat which drifted to the Captain on the first night he found a boat hatchet, and shortly after a small flag, which he secured; the former proved to be very useful in self-defence against the attacks of a shark; the latter as a signal, by which they were noticed by a steamer on Jan. 21st, which proved to be the Royal mail steamer England, Captain A. D. Dundas, on board of which they were received, having been forty hours in the above perilous situation.

The American Consul did not fail to express to Captain Dundas his grateful acknowledgments for his unremitting kindness and attention to the wants of Capt. Baker and his seaman, until landed at Cape Town, at which time, by a letter characteristic of the noble character of the gentlemen belonging to the Royal Navy and British seamen in general, he offered him a free passage to St. Helena or England. The officers and passengers, by every means in their power, while Capt. Baker was on board the steamer, appeared to vie with each other in adding to his comfort, and substantially expressed their sympathy and kindness by presenting him, through Captain Dundas, with a purse of money more than sufficient for all his wants while at the Cape.

GATES FOR THE NEW SHELL FACTORY, AT THE ROYAL ARSENAL, WOOLWICH.

ORNAMENTAL GATES FOR THE NEW SHELL FACTORY AT WOOLWICH.

Some months ago our readers will recollect that the Government thought it necessary to become the manufacturers of their own material for war purposes For years they have made at Waltham Abbey the gunpowder required by the service. Of later date, a splendid establishment for the manufacture of rifles was erected at Enfield, which is now filled with the most costly and beautiful machinery, and in full operation Since then an enormous foundry has been erected at the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, for the casting of shot and shell, while so late as last year a sum of money was voted for the construction of an immense establishment for the casting, boring, and finishing of iron ordnance of all dimensions. As regards the necessity for these works we have nothing to do: the Government, supported by many members of the House of Commons, say "Ay." Mr. Muntz, and almost as many members on the contrary, say "Nay; the manufactories of England are quite sufficient to produce the country all it can require, as good in quality and much less in cost." Whoever may be right the manufactories are built, and we can now only trust our rulers will so wisely officer these magnificent establishments that the country may have cause to be well satisfied with the immense outlay. Our Engraving shows a large pair of highly-ornamental gates, which are now fixed in the principal entrance of the New Shell Factory. They are formed of ornamental cast-iron work and wrought-iron bars, the whole fitted into a massive wrought-iron frame. The circular head is a feature under the archway, and the point where the large leaves of the gates open will be easily traced by the three balls, which represent shells with the fuse on fire, and which are immediately under the head. Round the upper ring in the head is scrollwork interspersed with shells in a state of ignition. The centre is formed of ornamental work, carrying a warrior's armed head with flowing beard, intended to represent war furious. The gates are filled with some of the most chaste, and at the same time richest, ornament which we have seen for a long while: including shells in a state of ignition; on the top is the monogram V.R. in a circle; beneath are the Royal arms, with A.D. 1856—the year of the manufacture. In the lower compartment there is rich scrollwork carrying a shield with the initial P., being that of the Minister of the War Department. The gates are finished in rich enamel of bronze and gold, whilst the heraldic portions embla[z]oned in their proper colours. Each leaf of the gate wei[g]hs about 25 cwt., and is 14 feet high, and yet so beautifully a[s] peculiarly are they hung that a child of six years of age can o[p]en them; they are fastened by a bolt the whole height of the gate, wh[ich] is again secured by a small patent lock, the key of which may be carried in the waistcoat pocket. As a piece of workmanship we cann[ot] speak too highly of these gates; and we have no doubt, if inspecti[on] our readers will agree with us that the art of fine metalwork has n[ot] entirely left our shores. The same firm manufactured and fixed t[he] whole of the large iron roof to this establishment. The head of t[he] department of the Arsenal is Captain Boxer, R.E., under whose imm[e]diate general instructions the whole of these buildings are executed. T[he] immediate superintendence of the works is confided to Mr. Murr[ay] the building engineer. The design for these gates was intrusted Mr. Charles Bailey, the architect; the manufacture, to Messrs. H. a[nd] M. D. Grissell, of the Regent's Canal Ironworks, London; and we c[an] only repeat that the work is a credit to all employed, and as a work art the country has much reason to be satisfied with it. The Messrs Grissell are justly celebrated for their manufacture of this kind ornamental ironwork The gates at the entrance of Buckingha[m] Palace and the Royal Exchange are amongst the number which ha[ve] been supplied from their works.

THE MANCHESTER ART TROWEL.

This beautiful art-implement, which was used by Mr. Fairbairn i[n] laying the foundation-stone of the Art-Treasures Exhibition Buildi[ng] at Manchester, has been designed and manufactured by Messrs. Phillip (Brothers), of Cockspur-street.

The Trowel is of oxydised silver, parcel gilt and enamel. Th[e] handle is composed of a group of a Corinthian capital, three minia[ture] statuettes representing the arts of Painting, Sculpture, and Archi[tec]ture, terminating in Greek scrolls, supporting the arms of Thom[as] Fairbairn, Esq., enamelled in heraldic colours, on a plate of fine gol[d]. The whole is surmounted by a round shield, bearing the arms of Man[ches]ter, also enamelled fine gold.

"THE MANCHESTER ART TROWEL."

The blade is ornamented with Greek scrolls, in which are introduced the names of the Exhibition committee, &c., on a ground of Byzantine blue enamel. The centre panel, bearing the inscription, is richly gilt. The design is perfectly original in character, and the metal-work is admirably executed.

Napoleon's Residence at St. Helena.—The Moniteur de l'Armee, in announcing that Longwood, the residence of Napoleon at St. Helena, has been given up to the French Government, adds some details relative to the measures which will be adopted for the repairs and proper keeping of the place: The Emperor Napoleon III. has, it is said, decided that this place, marked by souvenirs so dear to France, shall be repaired and kept in good condition, under the direction of some old superior officer of the French army who had served under the first Empire, and who will have for his residence at St. Helena the house which was in course of construction for the Emperor at the time of his death. This officer, selected on the proposition of the Minister of War, will have the official title of Conservator of the house and tomb of Napoleon I., St. Helena. The necessary repairs are to commence immediately. The tomb will be restored such as it was at the period when it contained the precious remains of the great man, and a funeral chapel will be built on the site of the dilapidated house in which was that last asylum, and in which he died. All the spots which have been immortalised by his presence, the hillock on which in fine weather he used to sit down and contemplate the sea, the place where he dictated his memoirs, the part of the road where he used to stop in his rides, &c., will be marked by some construction.

A Minister at Fault.—The Danish Constitution adopted in 1848 allows the Minister of the Crown to be proceeded against by private persons before the ordinary courts for acts done in their administrative capacity. In virtue of this permission, M. Salomon, a printer, of Copenhagen, last week brought an action before the Royal Court of Zealand against the Minister of the Interior, M. Bang, to obtain damages for having refused to allow a periodical published by him, called the Danish Library, to be sent through the post-office as a newspaper, on the ground that it was not technically such, inasmuch as it contained parts of a novel printed in such a way as to be detached from the body of the paper, and to form a volume. The Court decided that the Minister must pay damages, the amount to be fixed by arbitrators nominated by him and the plaintiff.

THE INNS OF COURT.

THIN a limited circle round Temple-bar, islanded by the thronged ways of traffic, and adjoining, yet apart from, the noisy thoroughs of commerce, the old paved courts and dark quadrangles of tall ses, that form the quiet colonies of the lawyers, stand in their illeged seclusion—curious portions of old London that seem (in the ds of our friend, Mr. Charles Dickens), to have been "left behind he march of Time." You need only cross the threshold of their rded ways to exchange the tumult of crowded garish thoroughfares, quiet courts, where "shadows and silence dwell;" to stand amidst int-looking groups of high red-tiled houses, old enough to have ltered a Bacon and a Plowden, a Selden and a Coke, and to find gs of the past, lingering as if spell-bound, amongst the buildings bygone age. But all is not sombre and dingy that we find hin the quiet Inns of Court: for there tall elms, inhabited by birds, nd their refreshing verdure; and you may stand on grassplots er whispering trees, while you hear the vast sound

From the streets of the city that 'compass them round.

high legal authority recently described the learned Civilians in ctors'-commons as moving in a kind of ancient twilight; and, cerly, so far as regards the enjoyment of the natural light of day penetralia of some of the less-favoured Inns of Court can hardly said to possess any greater share of enlightenment; while, to the nitiated, their constitution and purpose appear wrapped in a mystery ker than the aspect of their ominous labyrinths. They are looked n as provinces sacred to benchers and butlers, barristers and bers, law-students and laundresses, pleaders and porters, solicitors stationers, conveyancers and cooks—the heterogenous constituents he mythic University of the Law. And if these Inns present ernal features so unlike the rest of London, their internal priges and polity seem equally anomalous and antiquated. An Inn Court is supposed to be designed for a college of legal education; t its hall and chapel give collegiate associations to the spot; but public see in it only a stronghold of law and good living—an regation of unsavoury chambers round a savoury symposium. An n of Court is understood to be well endowed from olden time for proting the study of the law; but one looked in vain for a visible tem of education. Its fine hall is, indeed, collegiate in character l capacity -but the course was found to be gastronomic rather than demic; and as to the government of this Imperium in Imperio, less been known of it than of the most distant colony of the Crown. It , therefore, not surprising that, when Parliament recently addressed Majesty for inquiry into the application of their revenues and the filment of their assumed charge of legal education, the popular voice uld arraign the Benchers to answer for trusts broken and resources applied, for having sent forth their students graduated but unght, and for having allowed their halls to become mere refectories, ere at such accusations, however well founded, arose out of the faults a system, and were not justly attributable to any personal defincies in the Benchers of the respective Inns, all persons knew who re acquainted with the eminent men who form the government of d legal oligarchia—an Inn of Court. Mr. Phillimore, the Q.C., s them no more than justice when he ascribes to them a high ling of honour and a strong desire to do right, and points out that y have no interest save for the good of the society they watch over the honour of the profession of the Law. It was, however, supposed t all sorts of abuses had crept into the administration of the Inns Court; and so the Benchers were called upon to show what revenues y possess properly applicable to the study of jurisprudence, and at arrangements they have made for its promotion. The Royal mmission authorised inquiry into these matters, and directed the mmissioners to report upon "the means most likely to secure a und and systematic education for students, and satisfactory tests of ass for admission to the Bar." The results appear in the Blueok which was presented to Parliament in 1855, and their interest d importance are by no means confined to that portion of the comunity which is engaged in the study and practice of the Law. very Englishman has an interest in the enlightened training and e education of the advocate. To that education must be attributed e influences which lawyers exert, and upon its high character must pend the titles of the legal profession to its eminence in the estiation of mankind.

OLD CHAMBERS IN MIDDLE-TEMPLE-LANE.

The professional studies of the lawyers are, of course, foreign to the province of this paper; but there is much to interest the public in the history of the Inns of Court, and the recommendations which the Commissioners offer with the view of improving the education of candidates for the Bar.

And now to turn to their history. It may suffice to say, without stating the events from which the Inns of Court derive their origin, that in the reign of Henry III. the students and practitioners of the municipal or common law seem for the first time to have associated in a collegiate manner, and to have acquired the privileges of a juridical university. Although ecclesiastical persons occur as advocates for long after this time, and the study of the civil and canon law continued to be pursued at the old Universities, the practice of the common law seems to have become a distinct profession in the reign of Edward I. But the lawyers had not then become established in the Temple, nor as it would seem on the lands now occupied by any of the other Inns of Court. When the new legal societies originated, the white-robed Templars were building their monastery where the Inner and the Middle Temple now stand, and they had not long completed their famous round church, which seems to have given the name of the New Temple to their great convent here. In those days the military monks were still employed in defending the Holy Land from the unbelieving Moslem. Embassies passed between Jerusalem and London, and the "Red Cross Knights" were lords of nearly all Palestine. In the New Temple sovereigns were their guests; there councils assembled, and the military Friars dispensed a Royal hospitality. Their Great Hall seems to have stood where the present hall of the Inner Temple stands, and to have been built at or about the time (A.D. 1240) when they added that beautiful fabric, the oblong portion of the Temple Church. Considerable buildings connected by cloisters stood within their walls, which inclosed the monastery from the King's highway (now Fleet-street) on the north, from the gardens of a Bishop's palace on the west, and the lands of the White Friars on the east, and the whole site was held as a sanctified place, dedicated to God. But before the year 1310 the Templars had been seized, and their order suppressed, and the lawyers came to occupy the deserted chambers of the Temple, where the professors of the law were thenceforth (as old Fuller remarks) to use learning and eloquence for the purpose of defending Christians from each other, as the soldiers of the cross had used the sword to defend the Holy Places from the unbeliever.

The Temple then stood in the suburbs of London. The monastery and gardens of the White Friars bounded it upon the east; on the south was the Thames, bordered by the Templars' pleasant grounds, and there was a "great water-gate," through which "the King's clerks and justices" were wont to pass to Westminster. To the west, the banks of the river, on the line of what is now the Strand, were occupied by episcopal residences. The nearest of these, the inn of the Bishops of Exeter, afterwards became Essex House—which mansion, with its surrounding grounds, was bought by the Society of the Temple soon after the Restoration. Beyond this building was the inn of the Bishops of Bath, afterwards the mansion of the Earls of Arundel—which, in its turn, has left only the memory of its place, in the names of streets called after its noble owners. Then there was the Bishop of Chester's inn first built by Walter Langton, in the reign of Edward I., which stood near the Church of St. Mary, and became one of the Inns of Chancery, and in which the old poet Occleve dwelt; and near to it were the inns of the Bishops of Worcester and Llandaff, of Durham and Carlisle. Adjoining to the latter was the Palace of the Savoy, then an imposing castle; and in the vicinity there was the house of the Bishops of Coventry, where, at the stone cross, Edward I.'s Judges of Assize sometimes sat. Beyond the line of Fleet-street, on the north of the Templars' Courts, was the site of the old Temple, from which the illustrious order had migrated about the year 1162; and near to it was the house of the Bishops of Lincoln, built in 1147, which afterwards came to the Earls of Southampton, whose name is still preserved upon its site. Adjacent to these mansions in, what became Chancery-lane, were the palace and grounds of the Bishops of Chichester, who possessed in that locality a large tract—then open country—now part of Lincoln's Inn, and the site of Lincoln's-inn-fields. Here stood the palace and productive gardens of Henry de Lacy, Earl of Lincoln, who was residing in it at the close of the thirteenth century, and from whom that other great

TESTIMONIAL PRESENTED TO MAJOR-GENERAL WINDHAM.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

Inn of Court, little less ancient than the Temple, derives its name such were the neighbours of the lawyers when, more than five centuries ago, they settled in the Temple, by arrangement, first with the Earl of Lancaster, to whom, as Lord of the fee, the Temple had been ...lated; and afterwards with the Hospitallers of St. John, then being a very powerful body, to whom the property was granted by the Crown. From the time of Edward II. to the dissolution of the Hospitallers in 31 Henry VIII., the society of lawyers paid them a ice fium rent of £10 a year for the lands of the Temple.

When the lawyers came hither they found upon the buildings the st eld of the Templars (argent, a plain cross, gules) and the Holy Lamb bearing the banner of the order surmounted by a red cross; and they thenceforth assumed that bearing and cognizance for their own. Many of the rules and usages of the military brotherhood were likewise adopted by the legal fraternity. The ancient ceremony of admission into the privileged brotherhood of freres serviens closely resembled that of reception into the monastic order of the Temple. The coif is said to have descended from the frates servientes; and many observances of the Templars prevailed to our times in the Common Hall of the Temple, though its paved courts no longer echoed the tread of the military monks.

The Manciple or purveyor of provisions to the lawyers is referred to by Chaucer, who says that functionary had of masters more

RE-ELECTION OF LORD PALMERSTON.

The election of two members for Tiverton took place on Friday week, when Lord Palmerston and Mr. Heathcoat were returned without opposition. We gave a short notice of the proceedings in our latest edition of last week, and we now give the speech of the Premier entire. After the Mayor had declared John Heathcoat, Esq., and Viscount Palmerston duly elected, Mr Heathcoat briefly returned thanks

Lord Palmerston then came forward and was loudly cheered. He said—Gentlemen, before I begin to thank you for the honour you have done me I must beg a further favour at your hands, and that is, that you will allow me to address you with my hat on (Cheers). I have two reasons for this—first of all, that I may be your true representative, for you all have your hats on (Laughter); and in the next place I am sure you would not wish your representative to be disabled by any very bad cold in the head that would prevent him from doing his duty (Cheers). Now, gentlemen, I would, in the first place, say a few words as to the opponent who appeared the other day in the field (Hear, hear). There is an old maxim, and a very good one, that you should say nothing but good of the dead (Loud laughter); and not only of the dead, but of those from a feeling of justice towards that opponent, I think it right to say that he behaved in a very handsome manner when, finding that he had no chance of success, he determined not to put you or us to any further trouble (A laugh). He was no doubt misled by statements utterly without foundation; and he acted like a gentleman in withdrawing at the earliest moment when he found that his expectations were deceived (Hear, hear). Now, gentlemen, I cannot sufficiently thank you for the honour you have done me by renewing the confidence which I have for so many years, and at such repeated elections, received at your hands; and I can assure you that that honour is, in my opinion, greatly enhanced by my being associated with my most respectable colleague, Mr. Heathcoat—a man who stands eminently high in the estimation of all who know him, not merely within the range of the neighbourhood of his residence but also amongst all those who have come in contact with him in his public capacity (Cheers). Gentlemen, it is perfectly true, as Mr. Hall, who did me the honour to propose me, has stated, that I did receive from some very large and influential communities proposals that I should stand as a candidate to represent them in the coming Parliament. I felt, as you may believe, greatly gratified and flattered by that testimony of good will and approbation from communities so important and influential; but my answer was, that I was wedded to Tiverton (Great cheering); that I should not pronounce the divorce; and that I had no reason to think that my friends here wished to dispense with my future services (Renewed cheering). Well, gentlemen, the question on which I have the honour of addressing you is one which concerns, not simply myself as an individual—which concerns not merely the Government of which I am a member but which, in my opinion, involves a question of the highest national importance—a question which will be decided by the conduct of the whole of the British empire? (Cheers.) The combination has been denied; the concurrence is a matter of fact (Cheers). It did so happen that leaders of different parties did find themselves united to support the motion of censure upon the Government; and no man—no thinking man—will venture to deny that those gentlemen did think the carrying of that resolution would be followed by the resignation of the present Government and the formation of another (Hear, hear). Well, gentlemen, we took a different course (Hear, hear). We believed that the Ministry of the day, whether it possessed or not the confidence of the majority of the House of Commons, did possess the confidence and good will of the people of the United Kingdom (Hear, hear, and cheers). That opinion has been confirmed to me from a great variety of different quarters. I have had the honour of receiving addresses from a great number of large towns—large commercial and other towns—addresses signed as those who presented them to me told me, by persons of all ranks, from the highest to the lowest; by men of all parties. Conservatives, Whigs, Tories, and Radicals; and those addresses expressed expressions of regret and surprise at the resolution which the majority of the House of Commons had adopted, and were also expressive of continued confidence in the Administration of the day (Hear, hear). Those addresses, gentlemen, were not only highly gratifying to the Government, but, I think, they do honour to the national feeling; because they are a proof that party considerations were forgotten when a question had arisen which affected the interests of England were concerned; and that the same noble spirit which actuated the people of this country, and which obliterated all party considerations and differences during the war with Russia, that the same noble spirit—the plain and straightforward and practical good sense which distinguishes our people—distinguishes the people of the United Kingdom, led them to see the real question in this case—to see that the issue was whether the honour and interests of this country should be maintained, or should be sacrificed for the purpose of transferring power from the hands of one set of men to another (Loud cheering). Gentlemen, the Administration of which I have the honour to be the head was placed at a moment of great and serious difficulty (Hear, hear). As far as I am concerned, certainly but a very short time before I was called on by my Sovereign to form an Administration, I had not the slightest idea that task could ever be imposed upon me. There were others who had at their back great parties in the country. I stood comparatively alone, and, therefore, I had no reason to suppose that any combination could be formed of a character which could by my being called upon to perform the duty which subsequently fell to my lot (Hear, hear). I endeavoured to surround myself with men of similar opinions to my own, upon whose integrity and ability I could count; and I must say, in justice to my colleagues, that if success has attended our councils, and if our exertions have been crowned with results satisfactory to the people of this country, I claim no exclusive merit. The merit is equal to all the members of the Government, for all have contributed to the utmost in their power in the different departments over which they preside, with a unanimity that could not be exceeded, and which has not always been equalled, to perform the service of the country—to bring the war to a successful issue—and the peace to a satisfactory result ("Hear, hear," and cheers.. Gentlemen, it is well known that co-operating as we did with our gallant and noble allies—the French, the Sardinians, and the Turks—we did succeed in bringing to a speedy conclusion the war which, when it began, many believed would last for several years (Hear, hear. We obtained for this country a peace which accomplished beyond the expectations of many the objects for which the war had been undertaken,; and when the treaty of peace was signed it was found that we had secured the rights which that treaty had given us (Hear, hear). We did not permit any contravention or stratagem to deprive us of some of the most important stipulations which that treaty conceded (A voice—"Not for Lord Palmerston;" cheers). Gentlemen, it has been laid to my charge, especially, that the policy which has been pursued by us has been a turbulent and an aggressive policy. Why, if the policy which led to the war with Russia be called a turbulent and an aggressive policy, I do not know the meaning of those words; because that charge, if it were true, would be shared in by all parties in the state, and by the whole British nation also (Hear, hear). During the many long years that it fell to my lot to conduct the foreign relations of this country we escaped any war (Hear, hear). We no doubt had many difficulties to encounter. Many contingencies arose out of which war might have arisen, but out of which war did not arise (Hear, hear, and laughter). We maintained the interests and the honour of the country, and succeeded in preserving peace (Hear). Gentlemen, we did no small services during that period of time to the progress of civilisation and of civil liberty in Europe (Cheers). We succeeded in establishing the independence of Belgium, with a free constitution. We succeeded in assisting the people of Spain and the people of Portugal in establishing free parliamentary government in those countries and then, forsooth, we are to be called "friends and champions of despotism! -that we are adverse to the spirit of free and national principles! (Cheers.) Gentlemen, we wish to be at peace with all the great Powers of Europe—whether they have constitutional or Monarchical or Despotic, or Constitutional. These are questions which concern the people of the respective States (Hear, hear. What concerns us, and what concerns you, is that—that we should be at peace with—the other great friendly relations with this country (Hear. hear); that our commercial intercourse shall not be interrupted; that it shall be as free, with regard to tariffs, as the prejudices of those different countries may permit them to be. Well, then, we come to this Chinese question (Hear, hear). I have stated, and I do but simple justice to the Opposition in the House of Commons when I state, that they placed during the war with Russia their opposition in accordance with the feelings and spirit of the country (Hear, hear). It would be unjust if I were not to make that admission (Hear, hear); but in the beginning of this Session a change came over the spirit of the dream" (Laughter); and, from some cause or other, hopes and expectations appeared to be entertained that, on some question or other, the Government might be put in a minority and power transferred to other hands (Hear). First, it was supposed that we meant to keep up the war 9d. Income-tax duty. Disappointment followed that expectation; and the occasion slipped from out of their hands ("Hear," and laughter). There were other points, then, which were thought likely to afford an opportunity for political triumph; but, one after another, they failed (Hear, hear). Then came this outbreak in China, and—most unfortunately for those who so took it up—it was adopted as a question upon which to try the strength of respective parties. Well, gentlemen, what was that question? Why, unexpectedly, as regards the Government at home—independently of any orders from us, and not in consequence of any act of ours—a collision arose between our officers, civil and naval, in China, and that insolent barbarian Yeh, who unites in himself all the baseness, and all the cruelty, and all the perfidy that was ever collected in any one single man (Hear, hear). Well, after a bombardment of seven hours, and various other engagements, he began the recent conflict by an outrageous attack on the British flag (Hear, hear). It was the duty of our officers on the spot to resent this attack—to require an apology for the past, and an assurance of abstinence for the future. They were unable to accomplish that; they were unable to obtain those concessions from the Chinese Commissioner. We have had a great deal of technical argument about registers, and Colonial ordinances, and Imperial laws; but the question was a broad and simple one. Here was a vessel with the British flag flying—with a British register—with a British subject on board—that vessel was boarded by force, was violently assailed by Chinese officers, and the whole crew was taken away, with the exception of two men, whom these Chinese, in compliance with the request of the British commander, left to take charge of the vessel; and the only pretence for all this was, not that any one of those twelve men who formed the crew had committed any offence, but that an old man amongst them was the father of a man who was believed to be a pirate (Laughter and cheers). Well, then, a quibble has been raised on one point It is said that when the Chinese boarded this vessel there was no British subject on board. Why, because those twelve men were betraying no board another vessel only forty yards from the one boarded (Hear, hear). This other vessel being on the point of sailing for Hong-Kong, the commander of the Arrow wish on board to take a few passengers; but before the Chinese vessel he had returned on board, and it was especially on his entreaty that two of the crew were left to take charge of the vessel (Hear, hear. It is quite idle and frivolous to contend that the Chinese had not known the vessel was British. She had been lying off Canton for a week or ten days as a British vessel—it was distinctly as a British vessel the Chinese boarded her and took away the crew. Gentlemen, this was an outrage and a violation of our treaty. And what did our officers do? By way of reprisal they took a junk, and the Chinese Commissioner snapped his fingers at them, and said "You think you got a Government vessel, but it is only a merchantman, and I don't care a sixpence about it" ("Hear," and laughter). Other measures were then adopted by our officers. They took some forts on the river, and proceeded step by step, giving an interval between each successive step, to afford the Chinese Commissioner an opportunity of doing what he ought in reason and justice to have done; and, notwithstanding all that has been said about the cruelty of our proceedings, I say that never were the rights of a nation enforced with more forbearance and abstinence from unnecessary severity than ours were by Admiral Seymour—a man well known for his humanity—a man well known for his moderation, a man utterly incapable of abusing by an improper exercise of it, the great power which he happened to be intrusted (Hear). However, gentlemen, we have been told that our officers abroad ought not to involve this country in a war without distinct orders from the Government; and that our officers ought not to act without first appealing to the Parliament of the country. Gentlemen, will any one tell me that officers in another extreme part of the globe, when violent outrage is committed, are to remain with their hands across till they can send home for orders and receive instructions? Why, months would elapse before the insult and the resenting it, and perhaps our orders might be utterly defeated through the apathy and want of exertion during the long interval (Hear). Why, suppose a case similar to that which did happen, and was the cause of the former war suppose the Chinese had taken a dozen of British merchants, and had carried them off to Pekin, and had done anything which the Chinese had no right to call upon them to do—was our Admiral, or our Superintendent, to leave those men in prison till he wrote home to Europe and asked whether he should take steps to relieve them? Why, by the time an answer would have arrived, those men might have ceased to exist, and the answer of the Chinese Commissioner would have been, "I am sorry to inform you that three months ago those men died from their sufferings in prison" (Loud cheers). This, gentlemen, is the doctrine of those who contend that officers on distant stations ought not to resent injury and insult without such a course. I have stated that they have acted in accordance with our rights without previously referring home for instructions to guide them in the circumstance that may have arisen (Hear, hear). Then, gentlemen, there is the question as to the authority of the Government to undertake operations. No doubt, if Parliament is sitting, communication is made to Parliament. If Parliament is not sitting, and the occasion is adequate, Parliament should be called together in order that it may be acquainted with the circumstances that have arisen. But, in the first place, this cannot properly be called a war with China. We are not yet at war with the Chinese, as we are aware. We are at war with the authorities of this local authority has been adopted by the Imperial Government (Hear, hear. On the subject we have been informed by the latest accounts that at the other four ports—Shanghai, Ningpo, Amoy, Foo, and Amoy—the authorities had intimated that the proceedings at Canton do not interrupt the good relations which had hitherto existed between the Chinese and the British merchants (Hear, hear). There was no reason to be alleged why our commercial relations with them should be interrupted. We, therefore, do not know that the Chinese have made the proceedings at Canton a cause of war. We do not believe they are too well informed, both as to the nature of the violence committed, and the disproportion between the outrage and the means which we have superseded Sir John Bowring, by determining to send out Lord Elgin (Hear, hear). No such thing. It is perfectly natural, and in accordance with the practice of Europe, that, previous to cases of extraordinary difficulty, that though you have an agent in whom you have confidence, and of whose conduct you approve, nevertheless, to give additional weight to his negotiations, you send out from home some officer of high rank charged with the same verbal instructions of the Government, but with greater power, and with the addition of the character of Minister at home—an officer who goes out for a temporary purpose and a single object, and who is thus superseded the local agent, but who, from the weight he carries with him, is more likely to accomplish the particular object for which his mission is intended (Hear, hear. That is the case with Lord Elgin. His mission is exactly in point with that of Lord John Russell to Vienna, who did not supersede Lord Westmoreland, our Minister there; it is exactly in point with the mission of Lord Clarendon to Paris, who did not supersede our ambassador at the French Court (Cheers. Gentlemen, I think it was most unfortunate on the part of those who took up Mr. Cobden's motion to make is a question between parties and the Administration (Hear, hear). I positively believe that Mr. Cobden gave his notice without any previous communication with any party—for he was not when that motion was announced—when the words of it were placed on the papers of the House of Commons, before the debate came on then certainly every man must have considered perfectly open to him to give that resolution, if carried; and I am surprised that many men, well versed in Parliamentary business, and well knowing the effect of Parliamentary decisions, should have allowed themselves to believe, for a moment, that they were merely acting the part of jurymen, to decide upon a fact which had taken place at the other side of the globe, and that their vote was not to have any political effect on the administration of our affairs at home ("Hear," and laughter). Why, gentlemen, if the House of Commons was sitting as a jury on Sir J. Bowring, who ever heard of a jury proceeding so try a man 10,000 miles off (Cheers)? Yesterday, in addition to having the slightest conception that he was put upon his trial, without his having had an opportunity of instructing counsel to defend him? (Cheers.) I say that such a proceeding would degrade the House of Commons from the middle ages; but it would have nothing in common with the practice of the British Constitution. Well, gentlemen, notwithstanding all that, I am bound to believe that there were some men of liberal principles—some men belonging to the Liberal party—who did honestly mistake the nature and effect of the vote they were giving, and who, not meaning in any way to withdraw their confidence generally from the Government, voted, nevertheless, in the majority, the effect and intention of which was to turn the Government out (Hear, hear). Well, gentlemen, I say that this was an ill-considered vote, not perfectly consistent in accordance with political practice for any set of men, however much they may formerly have differed, yet, if they can agree as to a course of future policy, to take advantage of a fair opportunity to dislodge their rivals and place themselves in the seat of power I do not blame men for that—that is in accordance with our political constitution. They are friendly and feeling of hostility connected with our other as to know that there will be no obstacle in their forming a Government in the place of that which they are about to turn out. But if they are agreed if they see their way to making an effective Administration—why, what would be the proper course for them to pursue? They should propose in the House of Commons a vote of no confidence in the Government of the day—they should fairly put it to the country to choose between one party and another; but I say that it is not fair—it is not in accordance with the spirit of the British Constitution—it is not in accordance with the spirit and feeling of the British people, to take an abstract question, like that which one party is to be arrayed in hostility to the other, the interests, and the dignity of the country; and the other is called on to maintain that honour, to uphold the

EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

[SECOND NOTICE.]

We departed in the few introductory remarks we made last week respecting this Exhibition from the course we usually adopt of giving attention first to those works which demand the greatest powers in the artist. We did this in order to notice a few small pictures which bear much relation to the present contest concerning the degree of strict imitation proper to a work of art. Our want of space in last week's impression, however, compelled us to limit our observations to two pictures of still life, which would, of course, be nothing without exact imitation; and to two works by Mr. Anderson, whose simplicity of theme required that their interest should be so enhanced. We now proceed to mention two more pictures—in the first of which the quality of exact and minute imitation is proved to take none of the spirit from humour; and in the second where it asserts with some touch of sentiment.

"A Tidy Job—Study of a North Countryman" (750), by Mr. J. Campbell, jun., is at first sight coarse in subject and unpleasant in colour; a second look will, however, disclose great truth of imitation, admirable light and shade, and extremely felicitous expression. The north countryman is a tinker, in shirt-sleeves and corduroy inexpressibles, with all his vanity concentrated in a stamped or embossed velvet waistcoat which was once crimson. He has just completed the repair of a buckle, and the inward satisfaction with which he contemplates what he considers a very "tidy job" is expressed with a quiet humour beyond all praise.

Close to this, in the Water-Colour Room, is one of those London gamins, "An Itinerant Shoeblack" (780), by Mr. Smallfield. The eye of the industrious little urchin is full of precocious sagacity; but neither his face, nor his blackened but well polished exterior, seems to intimate that he is the offspring of drunken parents or that he has been reclaimed from crime. The manipulation is admirable.

If we have departed from our own precedent in noticing first a few works chiefly remarkable for their material imitation, we are not the less of opinion that there are far more thrilling chords in our being to be struck by painting than any touched in the illusion of the senses. Although in some of these works Nature's own eolian harmonies are superadded. This pleasure—for such it undoubtedly is—of illusion will, however, be surely given by those pictures we have named, even if the other works are not equally successful in their more ambitious aim

The old favourites of the public at this Gallery will of course be pleased that we should welcome new-comers whom they have served to introduce. We, therefore, at once proceed to pay our respects to the "master of the house;" or, as it is happily expressed in Scotch, "the gudeman"—in the person of Mr. Hurlstone, the President of the Society. It is a sad thing, no doubt, to find fault with a gentleman in his own house, to disparage his meats, and after bobnobbing with him depreciate his wine; and although a critic is capable, of course, of anything, we happily need not do so under the pretext of its being a duty. We may go so far as to slily insinuate that the Murillo-like figures in No. 574 are a little disjointed, and would be, therefore, less difficult to carve, and that there is a sameness about the annual entertainment. Seriously, however, Mr. Hurlstone's pictures are always redeemed by that rare and inestimable quality—expression. No. 128, for instance, is full of this fine quality. The subject is "The Son of Louis XVI. under the tutelage of Simon." The Dauphin, then nine years of age, is represented incarcerated in the Temple at Paris—that prison which secured his race only for the scaffold, and from which death alone released this victim. (An Engraving and description of this terrible Prison appeared in a very recent number of this Journal.) The immediate incident depicted is taken from a passage in De Beauchesne's "Life of Louis XVI.," in which his gaoler is represented to have surprised the young Prince "praying to God in a dream full of fervour," whereupon he exclaims, "I will teach you to say your paternosters, and to rise from your bed like a Trappist!" (alluding to the strict religious order founded in the valley of La Trappe), and then inflicted some of the punishment with which the poor child was only too familiar. The touch of pity in the face of the woman in the background deepens the pathos of the picture. And besides Simon, the brutal cobbler-gaoler, there is another, but more interesting, ghoul bird—namely, a bitter, captive canary, which is rather, too obtrusively painted. Mr. Hurlstone has, we believe, visited Italy during the winter; but we have no fruits of his journey; for in the last work we have to mention—viz., No. 328—as in the first, he is still true to Spain.

Mr. Baxter is in number of contributions not in great force; but they show all his usual weakness—for pretty faces. Who does not share this weakness, though, on looking at that lovely rustic lassie laying her hand on her innocent snowy bosom, and explaining in the gesture the title of the picture "Hope" (52), as well as in the healthy embonpoint of that bosom? Then look at that sweet little "Willie" (576): he is the very type of true English beauty in childhood: what a prize he would have been for the fairies!

"The Sick Boy" (36), by Mr. Roberts, seems to have been suggested by Mr. Willis's "Chatterton." If so, it pays the penalty of all imitations in being somewhat inferior to the original. It is, nevertheless, a very highly meritorious picture, full of pathos. "A Tender Chord" (332) has a pretty French effect; but something more like spinnet or harpsichord, and less like modern pianoforte, would have assorted better with the costume. "A Snooze" (667) is, however, capital.

Mr. Woolner's numerous contributions might be set up by the artist to disprove the antiquated notion lately revived, that painting is an imitative art. He might go further, and maintain that it is not even representative. Yet the effect of these works is, so to speak, artfully artistic. Not but that there are passages of careful truth as well as beauty. This we do not deny; but certainly the general surface is covered either by pure colours sprinkled in the "most admired disorder," or by markings of the brush equally inexact. Everything is misty and impalpable, like the dream of painting; but a pleasant dream, nevertheless.

To perfectly realise with pigments such a scene as Shakspeare represents with words when Othello suggests into loud lamentation at the death of Desdemona requires a painter as great as the poet. Mr. Salter's picture of this subject (No. 187) we may, therefore, be permitted to say, without giving much offence, proves that he is not to be allowed such illustrious rank, however laudably ambitious. This elaborate work of a painter accustomed to large canvases is wanting in appropriate expression.

We admire greatly the breadth of treatment and picturesqueness of "Il Ritorno della Contadina" (153), by Mr. Eagles. The noble Roman countrywoman is represented in the act of fording a stream (perhaps the Tiber, though it is not yet yellow) on her return home, as the declining sun begins to throw weaker and lower rays. She holds the hand of her little boy with one of her own, and with the other steadies an immense rush basket on her head, in which she carries, according to custom, her tightly-swaddled bambino. The basket also contains some green rushes and other gleanings from the Campagna; and the little juvenile brigand at her side has gathered and stuck in his hat some of those small yellow flowers whose perfume is much more powerful than pleasant, and which is so strong, indeed, that the Romans imagine it dangerous to sleep in a room containing only a few of them. Their dread of malaria may, however, partly account for this. "Il Piccolo Tesoro della Madre" (44), by the same artist, is, we think, not so happy; it is rather heavy and monotonous.

As we intimated in our former notice, there is an unusual number of works in this Exhibition which, although not of the very highest merit, still almost equally deserve separate consideration. Want of space, however, compels us to the following simple enumeration of such works, viz.:—"Cupid and Nydia" (429) and "The first meeting of Precious and Victorian" (482), by Mr. Patten (both, we would say en-passant, deserving better places); "The Rustic Mirror" (391), by Mr. Peele; "An Incident from Walpole's 'Anecdotes of Painting in England'" (24), by Mr. Noble; "Home Again" (396), by Mr. Collinson; Nos. 70, 28, 495 (the last is the smallest and the best), by Mr. Clater; "Tasso" (63), by Mr. Morgan; "Peace and War" (86), by Mr. Cockburn; "The Seaside" (203), by Mr. Henzell; "Katharine and Petruchio" (461), by Mr. Downard; "On the Moor" (514), by Mr. Hopkins; "A Bit of News—Angling for a Dinner" (285), by Mr. Pidding; and, lastly, "The Loiterer" (49), a pleasing little work, by Mr. Gill.

There are few portraits; but one of "Dr. Meryon" (94), by Mr. Reilly, struck us as very forcible in effect and individuality.

Mr. Buckner's portrait of "Sir George Jenkinson, Bart." (129), is marred by a degree of effeminate feebleness about the painting of the face which the backadaisical attitude renders more apparent. We must protest, also, against the impossible height of the figure, although Sir Joshua Reynolds has afforded precedents equally preposterous. We should think his figure measures four head-lengths more than the tallest antique. Mr. Gooderson displays, in No. 243, "Portrait of Mrs. B. Hall," the same regard for the authority of the old masters, though in other particulars, as the last named artist. The extreme flimsiness of a certain style of apparently aristocratic portraiture here exhibited would verily lead to the suspicion that in art, as in other things, les extrêmes se touchent

Among the animal-painters, Mr. Horlor deserves especial commendation for his "Calves" (66); and Mr. James Herring and Rose for their "Horses," in 221. Mr. Pidding's "Salmon Trout" (213) are also excellent, but not so the common fishfag thrown in.

A few works, chiefly landscapes, we reserve for consideration next week.

"MEG MERRILIES AND THE DYING SMUGGLER."

PAINTED BY R. S. LAUDER, R.S.A.

IN THE EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL INSTITUTION.

THOSE of our readers who have read Scott's admirable novel of "Guy Mannering"—and who has not?—will not fail to remember when Bertram, the Laird of Ellangowan, or Vanbeest Brown, as he was then called, left the post-chaise in which he had lost his way in the snow, and proceeded in quest of the light which he saw in the distance; and the extremely perilous night he passed in consequence. He is here represented standing in the light of the moon, rendered very ghastly by the snow on the turned roof of the ruined vault, just as Meg Merrilies has opened the door to allow, according to her superstitious notions, the soul of the dying smuggler to pass freely from the apartment. In her belief in fatality and superhuman agency she shows no great surprise at the appearance of the being for whom she has such intense and preternatural affection, but only holds up a cautionary finger to prevent him disturbing the flight of the soul of the dying man. The following passage from the romance itself will, however, help our readers the better to recall the scene:—

She moistened his mouth from time to time with some liquid, and between whiles sang in a low, monotonous tone, one of those prayers, or rather spells, which, in some parts of Scotland and the north of England, are used by the vulgar and ignorant to speed the passage of a parting spirit, like the tolling of the bell in Catholic days

Wasted, weary, wherefore stay,
Wrestling thus with earth and clay?
From the body pass away—
Hark! the mass is singing.

From thee doff thy mortal weed,
Mary Mother be thy speed,
Saints to help thee at thy need.
Hark! the knell is ringing

Scott says also, "she knew Brown at once, and her attitude, figure, and the anxiety of her countenance assumed the appearance of the well-disposed ogress of a fairy tale warning a stranger not to enter the dangerous castle of her husband." Mr. Lauder has admirably realised the dress and figure of the sibyl. It will be remembered that Meg Merrilies stood some six feet high; and, although her raven hair was then somewhat grizzled, and her face wrinkled, she was perfectly erect. She is represented equipped in a habit mingling the national dress of the Scottish common people with something of an Eastern character. The last is seen in the red head-gear, but particularly in the white shroud-like garment which surrounds her head like the cerements of the dead, and from which her dark elf-locks shoot out like the snakes of the Gorgon. The appendages hanging at her side, beside the dagger may be presumed to contain brandy, snuff, tobacco, and other witchlike necessaries; but the leathern bag is not the purse she gave to Dinmont, which its customary contents—that she is said to have dived into an immense pocket to obtain. The apartment is lit by a lamp which is placed on the floor; and the mysterious ghostlike shadows thus projected contribute not a little to the effect

It will be scarcely necessary to add that this dying man, the reader ascertains in the after part of the story, was the real Vanbeest Brown, the lieutenant of that monster Dirk Hatteraick, and that he received this fatal wound from the steady eye and well-tried hand of Colonel Mannering.

BRUHN'S AND D'ARREST'S COMETS.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

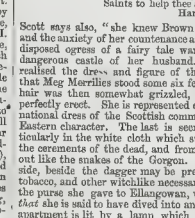
ANOTHER telescopic comet was discovered on the 18th of March, by M. Bruhn, at Berlin, which, like that lately discovered by M. D'Arrest, is now situated in the western sky. Although nearly as bright as the latter object, it is not so well defined, no nucleus being visible, and the edges of the nebulosity irregular and indistinct. It is of nearly uniform brightness throughout, and similar to the so-called planetary nebulæ in this respect, but the interior part presents a kind of radiating appearance. On March 23 it was situated in the neighbourhood of Theta Aridis



BRUHN'S COMET, 9 P.M., MARCH 23, 1857

The Engraving represents its appearance on the evening of March 23, at 9 p.m.

D'Arrest's comet was situated near 51 Andromedæ on the evening of March 23; on March 29 it was 4½ deg. north of Gamma Andromedæ; and on the evening of March 31 it was 1 deg. north of 62 Andromedæ. On April 3 it was situated between Iota and Beta Persei; on April 6 it will be near Nu Persei, on April 8 close to Epsilon Persei; and on April 15 close to Iota Aurigæ.

CHATTERTON.—(From a Correspondent.)—I have an impression that Chatterton's residence was No. 12, Brook-street, but you do not mention the number, and the house is on the left side as you enter from Holborn. Chatterton was buried in the large grave or pit, covered with a large blue painted board, appropriated to paupers. I visited it in or about the year 1795. There was no inscription on the board. The sexton showed it to me on the site. I think he was buried decently, as to circumstances of funeral, as his sister spoke of it with complacency when I visited her. She was good-looking and pale; her eyes were a lover would call light blue, but plain speakers, grey. I have an idea that Chatterton communicated with the Gentleman's Magazine, and was known to the house-agent. My friend Coleridge's ode, at the time it was written, was communicated to me. We never had the least conception that "Rowley" was anything but a fictitious name.—CORNUBIENSIS

FRENCH VIEWS ON ENGLAND.—M. Alexandre Dumas' first letter on the English elections appears in the Presse of last Sunday. It contains little more than extracts from the placards which met his eye on arriving in London, and nothing whatever to interest an English reader, except perhaps that he got out of his cab to inquire of somebody in the street why Christian electors were so earnestly called upon not to vote for Locke, and received an account of the state of the Sunday question which very much astonished him

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS LIBRARY.—The report of the Standing Committee on the Library of the House of Commons, published on Saturday, last states that the collection now amounts to upwards of 30,000 volumes; in 1845 it only numbered 4000. The increase has principally taken place in dictionaries, books of reference, general history, English history, diplomacy, topography, law, voyages, and travels, as well as works of authority connected with the East Indies and colonial possessions.

LITERATURE.

ARCTIC EXPLORATIONS. By ELISHA KENT KANE, M.D., U.S.N. Trubner and Co.

These volumes contain an account of the second American expedition in search of Sir John Franklin and his companions, in the years 1853, 54, and 55, under the command of the writer of the narrative. Dr. Kane had accompanied the first expedition, prosecuted in 1850, under the control of Lieutenant De Haven, so that he had the benefit of large practical experience. Mr. Grinnell, a most liberal and philanthropic American gentleman, opened his purse with a generous hand to pay the cost of both voyages. He placed the Advance brig at the disposal of the Commandant; and Mr. Peabody, the eminent American banker, resident in London, proffered his aid largely towards her outfit. Several of the scientific institutions also tendered valuable assistance. Eighteen persons ventured on this perilous cruise, ten of whom belonged to the United States' Navy; the others were volunteers at salaries "entirely disproportioned to their services." The plan adopted by Dr. Kane to rescue the British navigators, if found alive, is thus described:—

1. Terra firma as the basis of our operations, obviating the capricious character of ice-travel

2. A Northern line, which, throwing aside the influences of terrestrial radiation, would lead seamost to the open sea, should such exist.

3. The benefits of the famine abutment of land on the north face of Greenland, to check the ice in the course of its southern or equatorial drift, thus obviating the great drawback of Parry in his attempts to reach the Pole by the Spitzbergen Sea.

4. Animal life to sustain travelling parties.

5. The co-operation of the Esquimaux; settlements of these people having been found as high as Whale Sound, and probably extending still farther along the coast

The interest of this narrative commences when the vessel was rigidly fixed in the ice, and the crew commenced preparations for winter quarters and for their exploring expeditions. Among the most useful auxiliaries were Esquimaux and Newfoundland dogs, which required to be carefully trained, so as to obey the voice without the whip; but the whip was frequently used in travelling by sledges, and it required great dexterity with an Esquimaux team of twelve, as the driver, to execute his task with skill, was compelled to hit only one dog at a time, and accompany the feat with a resounding crack. The Newfoundland dogs succumbed to the severity of the climate, and Dr. Kane says "their disease is as clearly mental as in the case of any human being." Their material functions went on without interruption: appetite was voracious, strength was unimpaired, and they slept well; but the brain disease exhibited all the symptoms of true insanity. They fell victims to intense cold:—

On the 17th of January our thermometers stood at forty-nine degrees below zero; and on the 26th the range of those at the observatory at 84° to 67°. On the 8th of February our thermometers began to show unexampled temperatures. They ranged from 50° to 76° below zero, and one very reliable instrument stood upon the taffrail of our brig at 65°. The reduced mean of our best spirit standards gave 67°, or 99° below the freezing point of water. At these temperatures chloric ether became solid, and carefully-prepared chloroform exhibited a granular pellicle on its surface. Spirit of naphtha froze at 54°, and oil of sassafras at 49°. The oil of wintergreen was in a flocculent state at 56°, and solid at 63° and 65°

Dr. Kane has complimented two of our living writers by conferring their names on remarkable objects that he witnessed. The last station on the coast of Greenland he has called Cape William Makepeace Thackeray, but it was known to his party as Chimney Rock. In the immediate neighbourhood of one of his halting-places, to the north of latitude 79 deg., stands a solitary column or minaret tower of green stone, as sharply finished as if it had been cast for that Place Vendôme. The shaft alone is 480 feet in length, rising on a plinth of substantial itself 280 feet high. On this Dr. Kane observes,—"Those who are familiar with the writings of Tennyson, and have communed with his spirit in the solitudes of a wilderness, will apprehend the impulse that inscribed the scene with his name." Here also is "Three Brother Turrets," appearing like the triple towers of a castle, completely isolated and well defined. Then, among the sublimities of this Arctic scenery, appears the "Great Glacier of Humboldt." Next in succession is the mighty crystal bridge which connects the continents of America and Greenland, for Dr. Kane considers this great Greenland ice in mass strictly continental, and he considers its least possible axis, measured from Cape Farewell to the line of this glacier, in the neighbourhood of the 80th parallel, to exceed 1200 miles in length. On these frozen regions Dr. Kane makes the following critical remarks, which will interest all who have turned their attention to Arctic explorations:—

An open sea near the Pole, or even an open Polar basin, has been a topic of theory for a long time, and has been shadowed forth to some extent by actual or supposed discoveries. As far back as the days of Barentz, in 1596, without referring to the earlier and uncertain chronicles, water was seen to the eastward of the northernmost cape of Novaia Zemlia; and, until its limited extent was defined by direct observation, it was assumed to be the sea itself. The Dutch fishermen above and around Spitzbergen pushed their adventurous cruises through the ice into open spaces, varying in size and form with the season and the winds; and for Scoresby, a venerated authority, allusion to such vacancies in the ice as pointing in argument to a freedom of movement from the north, inducing open water in the neighbourhood of the Pole. Baron Wrangell, when forty miles from the coast of Arctic Asia, saw, as he thought, a vast, illimitable ocean; forgetting, for the moment, how narrow are the limits of human vision on a sphere. So, still more recently, Captain Penny proclaimed a sea in Wellington Sound, on the very spot where Sir Edward Belcher has since left his frozen ships; and my predecessor, Captain Inglefield, from the masthead of his little vessel, announced an "open Polar basin," but fifteen miles off from the ice which arrested our progress the next year. All these illusory discoveries were no doubt chronicled with perfect integrity; and it may seem to others, as since I have left the field it sometimes does to myself, that my own, though on a larger scale, may one day pass within the same category. Unlike the others, however, that which I have ventured to call an open sea has been travelled for many miles along its coast, and was viewed from an elevation of five hundred and eighty feet, still without limit, moved by a heavy swell, free of ice, and dashing in surf against a rock-bound shore.

Dr. Kane considers that there has been a change of climate in these regions, and that they were once milder than they are now. He points to the existence of huts, still in tolerable preservation, with stone pedestals, on which the natives used to sustain the carcases of captured seals and walrus; and the remains of a village, surrounded by the bones of seals, walrus, and whales, clearly show that the Esquimaux once inhabited those now deserted districts; and he infers a milder climate near the Pole from "the melted snow on the rocks, the limited but still advancing vegetable life, and the rise of the thermometer in the water."

A very exciting portion of the narrative relates to hunting animals for food, as the hare and fox, the bear, the seal, and the walrus. The Arctic bears did not hug the dogs, but tossed them high in the air; from which, however, their canine assailants do not suffer any injury, for inevitably the bears then to fall with all their muscles relaxed on the ice. The tactics of the Esquimaux dogs are admirable, for they hunt in disciplined concert, relieve each other, attack in front, and retreat right and left when they come within reach of the paws of their enemy. The method of taking the walrus displays both cunning and skill. Dr. Kane shows that the fancied resemblance of the walrus to man is greatly exaggerated, and ridicules the notion that this animal may have represented the merman and mermaid. It has tusks nearly thirty inches long, and the body measures eighteen feet in length. It emits a sound between the mooing of a cow and the deepest baying of a mastiff. It is captured by the Esquimaux in the following manner:—

Now for the marvel of the craft. When the walrus is above water the hunter is flat and motionless: as he begins to sink, alert and ready for a spring. The animal's head is hardly below the water-line before every man is in a rapid run, and again, as if by distinct beings, the beast returns, all are motionless behind protecting knolls of ice. They seem to know beforehand, not only the time he will be absent, but the very spot at which he will reappear. Myouk (the Esquimaux, still now phlegmatic, seems to waken with excitement. His coil of walrus-hide, a well-twisted line of many fathoms length, is lying at his side. He fixes one end of it in an iron bar, and fastens this loosely to a socket upon a shaft of unicorn's horn; the other end is already looped, or, as sailors would say, doubled in a bight. It is the work of a moment. He has grasped the harpoon; the water is in motion. Puffing with pent-up respiration, the walrus is within a couple of fathoms close before him. Myouk rises slowly, his right arm thrown back, the left fist at his side. The walrus looks about him, shaking the water from his crest; Myouk throws up his left arm, and the animal, rising breast high, fixes one look before he plunges. It has cost him all that curiosity can cost: the harpoon is buried under his left flipper.

Several accounts are given, both in the body of the work and in the appendix, of the various searches made for Sir John Franklin; and, though these expeditions display the highest daring and fortitude, they are all of nearly the same character, and, indeed, there could be little variety in an icy waste. Immersion in water, scaling frozen heights, the danger of being hurled down slippery precipices, intense cold, snow blindness, and want of food, form the staple of all the adventurous explorations, which are compiled from journals made on the spot. At length prudence admonished the crew to abandon the brig, and not remain during a third winter in those dreary solitudes. There were thirteen hundred miles between them and North Greenland, but they surmounted all the difficulties of their perilous route, the distance being passed over, by sledge and boating, in eighty-three days after they had left their vessel in the ice. They were taken home from the Danish settlement, Upernavik, in the United States' vessels Release and Arctic.

These volumes, published at Philadelphia, are highly creditable to the American publishers: the paper and typography are excellent, and the 300 engravings by which the work is illustrated are beautifully executed.

THE EARLY FLEMISH PAINTERS NOTICES OF THEIR LIVES AND WORKS. By J. A. CROWE and G. B. CAVALCASELLE. Murray.

For many years a vague mistiness overhung the early painters of Belgium. There was a dim vision of a great school looming through an atmosphere of doubts and uncertainties. A few forms such as those of the Van Eycks stood out with a certain precision amid the general gloom, with glancing though not very brilliant lights playing about the most prominent parts. These very lights, however, seemed only to double the obscurity in which the greater portions lay entombed. In a word or two cite the text of that quaint old historian, Vaernewyck: it appeared as if "the great skill, the great heavenly light and spirit of art had risen to perfection when no one knew ought of such before; and this in a rude country where no examples of works of art had been seen, and where consequently it was founded and brought to the highest perfection at once."

That the Flemish school attained its ultimate perfection in the hands of the Van Eycks is as evident to the present generation as it was to the old historian; but as, in the homely proverb, "there is no smoke without fire," it was difficult to conceive the total absence of all trace of painting previous to the appearance of the masterpieces executed by the chiefs of the school; and it was equally puzzling to discover that even the early efforts of the Van Eycks themselves were wanting, and had left no sign. Nor was the difficulty less great in the consideration of the invention of oil-painting, which appeared to have surged up, like the perfection of the Van Eycks, at once and without any previous preparation.

The book before us dispels this obscurity, retraces the rise of artists preceding those of Bruges, takes them from their cradle, shows them progressing in their march through the fourteenth century under the patronage of prince, burgess, and clergy; and by documentary proof, as well as the testimony of works, lays bare the foundation which had till now been encumbered by the ruins of this superstructure. Nor is it only the recapitulation of art's early efforts that is here for the first time produced, but the gradual preparation for the final improvements of oil-painting is clearly set forth, so that the final perfection of the Van Eycks ceases to partake of the miraculous character which it had borne for so many years.

The authors complain in their preface of the paucity of materials. To this may be attributed the want of amplitude given to the anecdotic and illustrative portions of their work; but if, in this respect, the story of early Flemish art remains comparatively without adornment, the authors can claim to have clearly set forth the influence which the school exercised over Germany, and the intimate connection between it and the earlier ones of the Rhine. The painters of Cologne claim precedence over those of Belgium, and left their mark on the artists of Flanders. When they declined and fell, the Flemings influenced the German painters on the Rhenish, as they did the Westphalians and Suabians, the men of Nuremberg and Augsburg; but before they did this they had exercised an influence of a marked character on the schools of Naples and Venice. The effects of this connection its early results in the production of Antonello da Messenel, rendered it important and necessary to write the life of that painter, for without that interesting page it would have been impossible to show the impress left on the early Venetians, or produce the conviction, now inevitable, that marked peculiarities were infused into the works of those painters, which are traceable not merely in the pictures of Antonello, but in the portraits of the Bellini. Were proofs required of the importance to art of tracing such connecting links, we might adduce one in the beautiful Marco Bossiti of the National Gallery, and show them the development of many germs of which the parent root may be found in the schools of the Van Eycks.

Apart, however, from these results of comparison, is it not interesting, by juxtaposition, to show that the Flemish painters attained the height of their renown whilst the Italians were only progressing towards them, and that, when the Raphaels and Michael Angelos attained their immortal eminence, the Flemings were far down on the path of decline, and hurrying to their fall?

It was inevitable that in the vigorous overhaul to which the pictures of these masters have been subjected radical changes of nomenclature should be made. Accordingly, we find that the catalogues of Berlin, Munich, and other galleries have, in some instances, been entirely overturned; and, whilst pictures of note have been restored to their proper authors, others, which had hitherto been classed as unknown, have gained a name. Walpole tells us that in his time the pictures of the Flemish school were classed invariably under the names of Mabuse or Lucas of Leyden. The custom had survived to our time, and it was incumbent in the authors to put an end to such a state of confusion. This they have done carefully, giving to the known masters their proper share of honour; and, where the names of artists remain unidentified, ranging them as imitators of the various branches of the great school of Bruges; so that, as fresh lights are thrown upon the subject, it will be simply necessary to give the name and preserve the order already observed. Justus of Ghent has been separated from Justus d'Allamagna of Genoa; and Dierich Stuerbout's manner has been defined with sufficient accuracy to render the school of Louvain a certainty in future.

Pictures of similar character and size, hung in various galleries under different names, have been restored to their original form and school. At the same time, the disputed dates, as well as contested facts in the lives of painters, have been restored to their natural order as far as there was authority for so doing. In this manner Roger van der Weyden and Roger of Bruges become one person instead of two. Memling's name is definitely fixed, and the hands respecting his life have been disposed of, as well as the claims of the German writers to the assumption that he was a child of their own.

We observe, for the first time, that Stephen of Cologne has gained a surname; and in future Stephen Lochener is to be the title of the author of the "Adoration of the Magi" in the Cathedral of Cologne.

Such are a few of the most important features of a book which fills up a void that had been hitherto seriously felt. Additional value is given to it by a series of fine engravings, which, although the smallness of their size deprives them of much that is characteristic in the master they are intended to illustrate, are yet interesting as showing forms of composition and subject. We trust we may yet see the history continued to illustrate the lives and works of Engelbrechtsen, Lucas of Leyden, Quintin Matsys, Schoreel, Patenier, and De Bles, to whom some of the pictures classed amongst those of imitators may perhaps finally be restored.

FRIENDS OF BOHEMIA; or, Phases of London Life. By E. M. WHITTY, Author of the "Governing Classes." 2 vols. Smith, Elder, and Co.

Mr. Palmore, in his reminiscences of Thomas Campbell, after remarking that the poet resembled certain Royal personages in his lurking fondness for "low company," proceeds to explain that he does not employ the word "low" in the ordinary use of the term, as implying persons of low condition and mean mental endowment. He uses the word "low" in order to indicate "that freedom from conventional restrictions which always springs from a low tone of moral sentiment, when accompanied by an open and bold-faced repudiation of those principles of personal conduct which form the basis of all cultivated society." In plain terms, Campbell was fond of Bohemian society. What Mr. Patmore requires a whole sentence to describe is comprehensively expressed in that simple word, for which we are indebted to Parisian journalism. Strictly speaking, a Bohemian is a gipsy, in the ordinary language of France. Hence Bohemia is now the current term for that extensive region inhabited by the gipsy portion of the artist and literary world. So much for etymology.

Mr. Whitty appears to have made Mr. Disraeli his model. Five or six years of London journalism have given him a pretty extensive acquaintance with the free livers in Bohemia. Occasional glimpses into the regions of conventionalism have enabled him to understand something of the West-end world, and he has embodied the result of his observations and experience in a series of dashing sketches of life and character, which remind one of the more savage passages in "Coningsby" and "Vanity Fair." Mr. Whitty has evidently not taken the trouble to do his best. Perhaps his digestion was at fault, or perhaps he had no sufficient motive. His doctrine, as he tells a Christian lady, is that "we are victims of our temperaments. If you are active, it is because you like activity; your climate suiting your moral duties." This is a charming doctrine for Bohemia; and it is well illustrated in the sayings and doings of the men and women whom he has represented.

As the book runs over with sharp, stinging satire about London personages, it is sure to be extensively read.

HISTORICAL SENTENTIÆ; or, The Contemporary Sovereigns of Europe, from the Subversion of the Empire of Rome to the Reformation. Judd and Glass.

In this work, within the compass of some 240 pages, we see at one view all the contemporary sovereigns throughout Europe at a given date, and generally in Asia and Africa. The leading events of each reign are concisely narrated; by way of impressing which upon the young student's memory, a tabular page is appended. This mode of teaching history by contemporary surveys, is the most successful, since, by a sort of plexus, or network, the events of one country are often borne in mind by the events of its neighbour; and isolated facts are often the best memoria for want of such a method as the above. The work is altogether neatly compiled, and well deserves to take rank among accredited school-books as an attractive mode of teaching history.

C. E. U. DUPRE, Rotterdam.—In the game played by Mr. Harrwitz blindfold against the Duke of Brunswick Wilna's 32th move should be, K to R 8th, not Q to R 8th. With this correction you will find Black can draw the game very prettily at the end.

A MYSTERIOUS WELL.—Workmen were set to work some time back to clear out a vast well, excavated in the rock of Polignac, near Puy. This well forty-two feet in circumference, and cut into the rock with great art at some unknown period, had, in the eyes of the people, all the attractions of mystery, and many a curious legend was related concerning its primitive destination. The archæologists of the district suspected it to be rich in antiquarian relics, whilst others believed that it contained hidden treasures. The work, which had been commenced with 1200 francs, partly given by the department and the Academie Society of Puy, and partly by the family of Polignac, had to be suspended for want of funds; it was afterwards resumed by the Duc de Polignac at his own expense, and has now been terminated. The well, 232 feet deep, was found to contain two springs of clear water, but no antiquities, save 150 stone cannon-balls, some keys of no very ancient form, and a few coins, one of which bears the effigy of Charles V. The termination of the work was celebrated by the workmen by a mass, as a thanksgiving for having met with no accident during the operation.—French Paper.

THE NEW CUSTOMS DUTIES ACT.—On Monday week the new Customs Duties Act was printed. From and after the 5th April next the duty on tea is fixed at 1s. 5d. per lb.; on sugar, 12s. 4d. per cwt.; on candy, brown or white refined, 16s.; on white clayed sugar, 13s. 10d.; on yellow muscovado and brown clayed sugar, 12s. 8d.; on yellow muscovado and on molasses, 5s. per cwt. For the year (6th April to 6th April, 1858) the duty is to be 2d the pound on cherries dried, comfits dry, confectionery, ginger preserved, marmalade, plums preserved in sugar, succades, including all fruits and vegetables preserved in sugar, not otherwise enumerated. The bounties and drawbacks are set forth. The Act came into operation on receiving the Royal assent (the 21st ult.), and is to be called "The Customs Duties Amendment Act."

THE GENERAL ELECTION.

MANCHESTER.

The nomination of candidates for election to serve in the next Parliament as representatives of the city of Manchester took place on Friday, on the hustings in St. Anne's-square, before the Mayor, Mr. James Watts, and in the presence of an immense crowd of people, there being about 15,000 people present, completely filling the area of the square itself, Exchange-street, and Anne street, to the right and left. Placards were posted throughout the city denouncing the interference and dictation of the "League;" but that once-powerful body, even although now moribund, did not appear to have altogether lost the sympathies of the populace, as the following little incident will show. Early in the morning there appeared in front of the hustings two men carrying on a pole a flat board, on either side of which was represented, in the character of Satan wearing spectacles, the effigy of an active member of the League. It was headed, in large capitals, "The Rump of the League," and was subscribed as follows: "I hold the keys of Manchester, and can return two of my own."

The new candidates, Sir John Potter and Mr. John Aspinall Turner, were the first to appear on the platform, and were rapturously received by their supporters. After a short interval Mr. Milner Gibson and Mr. Vaughan, brother-in-law of Mr John Bright, who was prevented by illness from being present, arrived, attended by their friends, and their reception was, if anything, even more enthusiastic than that accorded to the other candidates.

The writ commanding the election having been read, the four candidates Mr. Bright, Mr. I. M. Gibson, Sir John Potter, and Mr Turner—were severally proposed and seconded. Mr. Vaughan addressed the electors on behalf of his brother-in-law, and was followed by the other three candidates.—Mr. Roberts, an elector, then questioned the several candidates on the question of the suffrage. Mr Gibson, for himself and Mr. Bright, declared he was in favour of manhood suffrage, provided the man was sane and unconvicted of crime.—Sir John Potter and Mr Turner were understood to say they were in favour of household suffrage; wishing that the masses were educated enough to appreciate the value of the franchise. The same gentlemen, in reply to Dr. Watts, stated they would support a measure for removing the Paper-duties if the revenue admitted of it; they would support the ballot if they thought the majority of the people of England were advocates of secret voting; they did not think an educational rate could be easily collected. Mr. Turner, on being questioned if he adhered to the statement that the supporters of Mr. Cobden's motion were guilty of the deliberate murder of our countrymen in China, replied that he believed the majority of them acted for the purpose of barring out Lord Palmerston and taking his place. The Mayor then took the show of hands in favour of each candidate, and declared the election to have fallen on Mr. John Bright and Sir John Potter. A poll was then demanded on the part of Mr. Gibson, which was fixed to take place on Saturday. The proceedings then closed with a vote of thanks to the Mayor, proposed by Mr. Gibson, and seconded by Sir John Potter.

Notwithstanding that both parties commenced the work of Saturday with a conviction that the struggle would be one of the most arduous and fierce upon record, seldom has a contested election passed off with so complete an absence of anything like brawls or disturbance. The number of vehicles used by each side was immense. Every public coach, car, or hansom that could be procured in the city was engaged; others were obtained from surrounding towns; and scores of private carriages, gigs, dog-carts, &c., were pressed into the service, being duly placarded with the names of the candidates in whose behalf they were used. Excellent arrangements were made at the eighteen or nineteen polling booths; but even in their vicinity there was little excitement, save the constant arrival and departure of vehicles, and the anxiety to get a sight of the hourly returns of the polling.

In the centre of the city these returns were most anxiously waited for. The newspaper-offices, the committee-rooms, and Cope's sale-rooms, Clarence-street, where the Turner and Potter executive met during the day, were surrounded by dense crowds from ten o'clock until after four. The progressive increase of the majorities of Potter and Turner over their opponents caused much enthusiasm. When the return for one o'clock was posted outside the Guardian office, showing majorities of about two thousand, the crowd gave vent to their feelings in the most lusty manner; and other subsequent returns were similarly received. Even at eleven o'clock leading members of the Gibson and Bright committee plainly admitted that their only hope was to reduce the then majority (about 1,000); it being also admitted that for several days they had known that the old members had no chance of being re-elected. The night passed over without any of the street brawls amongst the lower classes, strong as was the feeling amongst them; and it would appear from all accounts that the Manchester election, 1857—which will certainly be a memorable one in the city—will also be looked back upon by those concerned, and the public generally, as one worthy of remembrance for the determination and the good temper with which it was conducted.

According to the Guardian there was but one charge of personation during the day. We have not heard with certainty from which side the charge came; but the respectable elector who, when he tendered his vote at the outset of the day, found that he had been dead for a long period, and who was given into custody as a fraudulent personator of himself, must have felt greatly reassured as to his identity and existence, and must have had his ruffled feelings pleasantly calmed when, at the Townhall, the Mayor identified him, and pledged himself that the unfortunate voter was the person he had represented himself to be.

The result of the polling was duly announced on Monday at noon, by his Worship the Mayor, in front of the Townhall, King-street. His Worship was attended by Mr. Herron (Town Clerk), Sir John Potter, Mr. J. A. Turner, Aldermen Neild, Barnes, and Shuttleworth; Messrs. Malcolm Ross, John Pender, John Heugh, and a number of the leading supporters of Messrs. Potter and Turner.

The Mayor announced the numbers to be as follows:—

|---|---|---|---|
| Sir John Potter, Knight | .. | 8368 | Right Hon. T. M. Gibson .. 5544 |
| J. A. Turner, Esq. | .. | 7854 | John Bright, Esq. .. 5488 |

He then declared Sir John Potter, Knight, and James Aspinall Turner, Esq., duly elected as the representatives of the borough of Manchester in Parliament.

THE CITY OF LONDON

The polling for the city of London commenced at eight o'clock on Saturday morning, and throughout the day it was conducted with an unusual amount of vigour. During the first hour few votes were recorded as compared with any of the succeeding hours. The published lists at nine o'clock placed Baron Rothschild at the head of the poll, Lord John Russell second, Sir James Duke third, Crawford fourth, and Currie fifth. Between nine and ten o'clock much more animation was observable both at the local polling-places and at Guildhall, more than three times as many votes having been given in the second hour as had been given in the first. The relative position of the candidates remained the same. Lord John Russell, however, having slightly gained on Baron Rothschild. During the third hour as many voters were recorded as in the first two hours put together; while Lord John Russell, who had gone on steadily diminishing the distance between himself and Baron Rothschild, at eleven o'clock occupied the first position, the other candidates being in the following order:—Rothschild, Duke, Crawford, Currie. Soon after eleven Lord John Russell, accompanied by Lady John Russell, his eldest son, and two daughters, drove through the City to his friend's committee-room in King-street, where her Ladyship and family remained until the close of the poll, while his Lordship, in company with Mr. Bennoch, and other members of his committee, proceeded to different parts of the City to animate by his presence the exertions of his supporters. Some time before noon cards were handed about and placards posted, inviting the electors to support Rothschild and Russell. The names of no other candidates being mentioned. This, combined with the fact that every hoarding had, during the morning, been covered with bills stating that Baron Rothschild, if elected, would not sit, induced the friends of Sir James Duke to believe the rumour of an understanding, or perhaps it would be more correct to say a "coalition," having been effected between those two candidates; the consequence was, that a large number of plumpers were recorded for James before twelve o'clock. At this hour Lord John was at the head of the poll, Sir James Duke second, Baron Rothschild third, Crawford fourth, and Currie fifth; a position which the latter retained to the end of the contest. At the end of the next hour Sir James was, in consequence of this rumour, placed at the head of the poll; Russell, Rothschild, and Crawford next in order. At two o'clock Sir James Duke still maintained his position, he having polled up to this hour 5793—being considerably in excess of the total number by which he was returned at the last election, when the poll in 1852. The other candidates had polled: Duke, 6807; Russell, 6493; Crawford, 5811; Currie, 4839. From nine o'clock the numbers polled by the several candidates had been differently stated by the committees of Lord John Russell and of the four Liberal candidates. We append a specimen of the returns as given by the two committees, which differ considerably from the real numbers as given at the declaration of the state of the poll:

younger branches of his family, visited Guildhall, and appeared much interested by the busy scene which presented itself. As four o'clock drew near, that part of the hall outside the barriers, put up to secure a free passage to electors became densely crowded by spectators, all apparently anticipating that the successful candidates would return thanks on the close of the poll. Sir J. Duke had been present from two o'clock, personally thanking the electors who voted in his favour, for their support. About five minutes before four Lord J. Russell, accompanied by various members of his committee, entered the hall, and took up a position on the hustings, amid loud cheers, which were vigorously renewed as the Guildhall clock indicated the close of the poll. A simultaneous closing of books and vacating of stations by the poll-clerks in the hall were speedily followed by the formal announcement, by the City crier, of the proceedings being terminated, and by the summons for all present to appear again on Monday to hear the official declaration of the polling. Three cheers were then heartily given for Lord John Russell and Baron Rothschild, when a short pause ensued, in the expectation of his Lordship coming forward to speak. No such intention being immediately manifested, he was loudly called for, and after some little delay came forward, apparently much gratified at his success, and at the hearty greeting which had been accorded him. Silence being restored, the noble Lord said—

"Gentlemen,—You are no doubt aware that the time for the members returning thanks is when the poll is declared on Monday, and, as Baron Lionel Rothschild is not here, I should be very unwilling to make a speech at the present time, in his absence. Still, gentlemen, as we have a pretty good guess what the state of the poll is, I beg to observe to you what was remarked to me in the course of the polling to day, that this is a splendid victory. This is the people's battle: the people have won it and no one else. (Loud cheers.)"

After a few words from Mr. Crawford, Sir James Duke, and from Mr Deputy Holt on behalf of Baron Rothschild, the assembly gradually vacated the hall. Lord John Russell retiring to his committee-room in King-street, and on his departing from the City, shortly after five o'clock, with Lady Russell and his family, he was very warmly received.

The official declaration of the poll took place on Monday, in Guildhall, at one o'clock. Shortly after twelve o'clock the body of the hall was filled by a respectable and well-conducted auditory. The gallery for the accommodation of ladies, removed after the nomination to give place to the desks of the poll-clerks, had been re-erected during the morning. Among its fair occupants were Lady Russell and daughters, the Baroness Rothschild, Baroness Meyer Rothschild, the ladies of many of the members of the Corporation, and several of the suite of Ferouk Khan, the Persian Ambassador. The balconies around the hall were also occupied by ladies, whose gay dresses presented a pleasing contrast to the sombre tints of the mass of spectators in the body of the hall and of the occupants of the hustings. The appearance of the successful candidates on the hustings was the signal for a round of cheering, which was kept up for several minutes.

Precisely as the clock struck one, the City crier, Mr Harker, having made the usual proclamation, Mr. Sheriff Mechi came forward and stated the number of votes returned for each candidate to be for—declaring that the first four were duly elected to be representatives in the ensuing Parliament for the city of London (Cheers).

EXAMINATION AT THE FINSBURY

THE LAMBETH ELECTION. THE HUSTINGS AT KENNINGTON.

Sir James Duke, Baron Rothschild, Lord John Russell, and Mr. Crawford, severally thanked the electors for the support they had given. The most remarkable speech was that of Lord John Russell. With reference to the question of Reform he made the following remarks:—

"And let me say now, that superior to any question—superior to any political question, to extension of the suffrage, to the ballot or to any other—is the maintenance of that free spirit, the maintenance of that love of independence, which distinguishes the people of England, and upon which our institutions and liberties must ultimately rest (Cheers). Now, gentlemen, let me say a word, and it shall not be long, on our future prospects (Cheers). We have hitherto had as an excuse for any Minister it was my excuse, it has been the excuse of Lord Palmerston, and I think a very just excuse—that parties in the House of Commons were so evenly balanced that it was difficult to carry Liberal measures with a sufficient majority to procure the assent of the House of Lords. But if it be true, as I trust it is, that a great Liberal majority is elected to the new Parliament, that excuse must fall to the ground (Cheers); and Lord Palmerston will have no reason whatever for not bringing forward, not six or seven, not a dozen measures, but beginning with one or two measures of considerable importance, which may show that the Ministry are true Reformers, and that nothing but circumstances have cooled their ardour. And, gentlemen, I see some symptoms of improvement in this respect, because the people of the United Kingdom have not allowed this election to turn upon a temporary question—whether Sir J. Bowring was right or wrong. The nation has had the good sense not to allow itself to be divided into 'Bowringites' and 'Yohites.' They know that the true divisions are between the Conservatives and the Reformers—Conservatives desirous to maintain our institutions, and not to improve them; Reformers desirous to improve our institutions, and at the same time to preserve them. We have had symptoms in the late Parliament of a small measure—for a small measure it was proposed by Mr Locke King. Upon that subject we heard nothing in the House of Commons at that time but objections to that measure, and if it had been a larger measure the objections would have been stronger and more decisive; but no sooner was there a question of dissolution of Parliament, and, more especially, no sooner did the members of the Administration go to their constituents, than it was discovered that they were all really in favour of that motion (Laughter). But there were in Mr Locke King's bill—which they had never seen, which I am told Mr. Locke King says he never communicated to them—certain faults and defects which alone prevented their voting in its favour. Why, if that be the case, what an opportunity they have in the new Parliament! They can frame a measure of their own. They can put in all the guards and securities which they are desirous of inserting. They can put in all those guards and securities which I inserted in a bill two years ago, and then no doubt they will carry that measure triumphantly through both Houses of Parliament. It is in this way that the dissolution of Parliament will prove to have been really of use to the people of this country."

FINSBURY.

From the first hour of the polling on Saturday morning it was evident that there was no doubt of the triumphant return of Mr. T. S. Duncombe, and that the fight would be between Mr. Serjeant Parry and Mr. Cox, Major Reed being considerably behind on the first hour's polling. Mr. Serjeant Parry maintained the second position on the poll until eleven o'clock, when he had to give place to Mr. Cox, who continued to head his second opponent throughout the rest of the contest, although exceedingly close. Major Reed appeared to have no chance, and no states of the poll were issued from his committee; but those issued by Mr Duncombe's committee and the committee of Mr. Cox coincided with each other.

The final close of the poll was thus given by the committees of Mr. Duncombe and Mr. Cox:—

| | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Duncombe | .. .. | 7441 | Parry | .. .. | 4135 |
| Cox | .. .. | 4359 | Reed | .. .. | 2582 |

Thus giving Mr. Duncombe a majority of 3082 votes over the next highest candidate upon the poll, and Mr. Cox a majority of 224 over his competitor, Mr. Serjeant Parry. At the close of the poll at four o'clock at least 10,000 persons had assembled on Clerkenwell-green, in the hope of hearing an address from some of the candidates, more especially those who were understood to be successful; but they were doomed to disappointment, and, to make up for this shortcoming, an "independent" elector made a speech from the window of Mr. Cox's committee-room, the Crown Tavern, which appeared to have such an exciting effect upon his auditory that several fights took place, and the uproar was only quelled by the interference of the police.

It is said that the return of Mr Cox will be petitioned against—upon the ground that he has employed paid canvassers. The opinion of counsel has been taken, and that opinion is, that such a proceeding is an act of bribery.

On Monday Mr. James, the returning officer, announced the state of the poll as follows:—

| | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Duncombe | .. .. | 6922 | Parry | .. .. | 3954 |

and declared the first two to be duly elected. The declaration of the numbers was received with loud cheers or groans by the respective supporters of Messrs. Cox and Parry, who were present in great numbers.

Mr Duncombe, in his speech to the electors, said: There was a sect springing up in the House of Commons which not only said there, but which also attempted to create the feeling in the country, that whatever England does is wrong, and that whatever foreigners do is right. No, no. It is time that feeling should be put down. I shall go back to my place and resume my seat in the House of Commons the same reformer and advocate of civil and religious liberty that I have ever been (Cheers). I am tied to no Minister whatever (Applause). You have the authority of Sir J. Graham that Lord Palmerston is a Tory of the deepest dye. I do not dispute that Sir J. Graham is a very good judge of Toryism, for he sat in Governments and in Cabinets with the rankest Tories of former days (Hear, hear). Sir J. Graham and Lord J

Russell are now bidding for popularity and calling themselves Reformers. All I know is this, that, till within the last few years, the extension of the franchise and Parliamentary reform have been opposed by these gentlemen (Cheers). They have changed their opinions; why should not Lord Palmerston change his? He is too old a diplomatist, whether at home or abroad, not to know that if he wishes to keep the Liberal party together—if he wishes to retain the support which the people of England have given to him on this occasion—he must march with the times (Cheers); and it will be my chief task, whether Lord Palmerston or any other is the Minister—to see that that Minister does his duty by the rights of the poor (Bravo), by the property of the rich, and by the extension of the freedom and liberties of mankind.

Mr. Cox adverted to the charge of bribery which had been brought against him. He had been charged in a bill put forward by Major Reed with contravening the Act of Parliament in employing paid agents. The election auditor, however, declared that they were legal, just, and proper charges. He could only say that he was ready to try the question with his opponents before an election committee, or before a court of law

LAMBETH

The nomination took place on Saturday, at ten, at the Triangle, Kennington park. The space in front of the hustings was not very large, and it certainly was not half filled. The crowd, considering that there was a popular candidate, was exceedingly orderly and well conducted; and, except ing when it came to Mr. Wilkinson's turn, gave every one a fair hearing. The crowd was backed by a line of men carrying placards for Roupell, who, ranged exactly in front of the hustings, and shouldering their placards with military precision, formed an artistic finish not always to be found in election crowds. Besides these men Mr. Roupell had an equestrian escort in his colours from head to foot, who dashed backwards in the midst of Mr. Williams's speech, interrupting one of his most telling periods. It was no wonder that he should call out "Don't pay attention to that mountebank!" The popular candidate had offered for the occasion a theatrical great coat with fur lining, and issued forth from the Horns to the hustings in an open carriage and four, followed by old carriages containing his lady friends, some of whom were remarkably pretty. The hustings accommodation was anything but sufficient, and the matter was not mended by the police, who, when the later reporters arrived to discharge their duties, coolly refused to exercise their powers, or to let them in, stating that "there were reporters enough there already." There were not salient points enough about the election to give opportunities for much reporting, for good placarding. The most conspicuous of the last was one entreating the people to "Vote for Viscount Williams and the British barristocracy," an allusion to the supposed cockney elevation of the honourable member, and a report that he had refused a Peerage. Of course Wilkinson could not hope to escape "Wilkins and his Dinah." The opponents of Roupell either had no great share of this sort of wit, or no opportunity of exercising it, for there was nothing said or exhibited against him, except an occasional allusion from the mob to the weight of his purse. The proceedings were opened at ten o'clock, with the ordinary proclamation by the returning officer, Mr. H. Onslow. The three candidates having addressed the crowd, the show of hands was taken, and declared to be in favour of Messrs Roupell and Williams. A poll was, of course, demanded for Mr. Wilkinson. A vote of thanks was then passed to the returning officer, and the proceedings ended.

The polling took place on Monday, when Mr. Roupell was chosen by a majority of 246. The numbers for the respective candidates at the close of the poll were—

The Huddersfield contest has excited as much interest as that of any borough in the kingdom, and many of the electors gave their votes, not so much as an expression of their opinion as to the policy of Mr. Akroyd or Mr. Cobden would make the better member of the Legislature, but as a manifestation of their approval of the course pursued by Lord Palmerston's Government to uphold the honour of the British flag and the interests of this country in reference to the Chinese affair, and also in condemnation of the views of Mr. Cobden. The total number of electors on the register is 1852, and it will be seen that nearly the entire list of voters—1,420—out of the poll was inquired after with great interest during the day through-out the whole of the West Riding. A great many persons went to Huddersfield from the surrounding towns and villages; and at the close of the contest an immense crowd had assembled in St. George's square—larger than was present on the nomination day. It is not an over-stimated computation to say that there were not less than 10,000 people present. A few minutes after four o'clock Mr. Akroyd, the successful candidate, presented himself at one of the windows of the George Hotel, and briefly addressed the large assembly. He was most loudly cheered.

GREENWICH.—Mr. TOWNSEND, local auctioneer and undertaker, has defeated Mr. Montagu Chambers, and elected as a colleague to General Sir W. Codrington. Mr. Chambers's defeat is attributed by his friends principally to the fact of his having supported the Sunday Trading Bill introduced by Lord Robert Grosvenor. His measure excited much opposition in Greenwich, especially among those tradesmen who derive considerable profit from the influx of visitors from London on a Sunday. During the canvass great efforts were made to convince the electors belonging to those classes that Lord Robert Grosvenor's bill would not have militated against their interests, but it was only in a few instances that these efforts were successful. The unpopularity was also excited against Mr. Chambers by the fact that he had not been present at so many divisions as the people of Greenwich thought he ought have voted in

THE LANCASHIRE MEMBERS. The elections for this county may be said to have been made for, though the North Lancashire nomination takes place this morning, and that for South Lancashire on Wednesday, there seems no probability of any opposition being made to the re-election of the old members. Of those Lancashire members who voted (or paired, in the minority with Government on that motion, three have subsequently retired from Parliament, viz.—Mr. Acton (Wigan,, Mr. M. J. Feilden (Blackburn, and Mr. J. Heywood (North Lancashire). Of those who voted (or paired, against Government and with Mr. Cobden, three retired from Parliament Mr. T. Greene (Lancaster), Mr. R. T. Parker (Preston, and Mr. Le G. N. Starkie (Clitheroe). Of those who again offered themselves, having voted (or paired) in favour of the Government, four have been re-elected—Mr. Cobbett (Oldham , Messrs. Horsfall and Ewart (Liverpool, and Mr. Gregson (Lancashire); while two have had their seats Mr. Peel (Bury), and Sir G. Strickland (Preston). Of those who voted (or paired) against Government, four have been re elected Mr. Crook (Bolton), Mr. Greaall Warrington., Mr. Pilkington (Blackburn, and Mr Patten (North Lancashire ; and four have lost their seats Mr. Fox (Oldham), Mr. Gibson (Manchester), Colonel Lindsay (Wigan, and Mr Miall (Rochdale). Of those who were absent, two have lost their seats Mr. Bright (Manchester), and Mr Barnes (Bolton); and three are re elected Messrs. Brown and Cheetham (North Lancashire), and Mr. Charles Hindley (Ashton). It appears, therefore, that those who voted on Mr Cobden's motion, had nine votes against and eleven in favour of that motion; not counting six absentees, most of whom had they been present, were very likely to have voted with the majority. The Lancashire sends to Parliament twenty members, who will give a general support to Lord Palmerston, and six members who may be expected to be found in the ranks of the Opposition. It is hoped to observe that we are to become Parliamentary Reformers (Loud cheers and laughter). It is only a question of time and of degree, and I hope that the hon. gentleman on the other side of the hustings will be found among the supporters of the bill giving effect to the extension of the franchise—then he and I shall be found in the same lobby giving effect to the opinions which you have unequivocally expressed" (Hear, hear).

ELECTION RIOT AT KIDDERMINSTER. The polling took place on Monday. The two candidates for this borough were Mr. Lowe, the late member, and Mr. Boycott, a Conservative. The votes were—for Lowe, 234; for Boycott, 230. Shortly after the close of the poll, and before the poll was finally closed, although no elector had voted in the last half hour, an attack was made upon Mr. Lowe and his friends by the mob, which now numbered from 3000 to 4000 persons, who, with loud hootings and imprecations, threw stones and brickbats into the booth, evidently directed against Mr. Lowe and Mr. Pardoe, his proposer. The Mayor and other gentlemen made repeated efforts to calm the mob, but ineffectually, and the Mayor was requested by several magistrates to read the Riot Act, which, however, he, perhaps wisely, refrained from doing, as it would probably only have further exasperated the crowd, which it would have been impossible to disperse, the only force at the command of the Mayor being the local police, and some seventy or eighty special constables sworn in on the previous day. The attack becoming more serious, several persons having received severe cuts and wounds from the missiles, and it being evident that in a few minutes the mob would burst into the booth, a general rush was made out of it into the crowd, and Mr. Lowe and the Mayor were conducted towards the town (the booth being situated in the outskirts). The mob followed with hootings and yells, and continued their attack, throwing stones and brickbats as before, until Mr. Lowe's friends carried him into a house in Bewdley-street, which was immediately surrounded by the mob, and the windows smashed from top to bottom. Mr. Lowe was so seriously injured and weakened from loss of blood that it was found necessary to secure the services of Mr. Stretton, surgeon, forthwith. Mr. Stretton discovered that Mr. Lowe had sustained a fracture of the right parietal bone of the skull, in addition to a lacerated scalp wound and many other severe contusions on the side of the head. Four of the rioters were captured by the police on Saturday, and were brought before the magistrates for examination on Monday. Two of them were discharged, and the other two remanded till Friday, by which time it was expected that some of the ringleaders would be apprehended. As the magistrates were apprehensive of renewed disturbances they telegraphed for a troop of Hussars, who arrived on Saturday night.

SOUTHWARK

The nomination of candidates for the borough of Southwark took place on Saturday, at twelve o'clock, the hustings being erected in front of the Town-hall, on St Margaret's-hill. Shortly after eleven o'clock appeared some six or 600 of the "Liberal Independent" electors of Southwark, of whom the most prominent of whom were a large number of coalheavers and costermongers, bearing in front of their caps and fantails the cards of their favorite. Mr. Locke, with the favourite gentleman seemed to be the popular candidate. By twelve o'clock something like 5000 persons had assembled in front of the hustings, chiefly of the class before described; and on the appearance of the respective candidates making their appearance they were greeted with the usual amount of applause or disapprobation, in accordance with the position they held in the scale of out-door popularity. On Mr. Locke presenting himself he was exceedingly well received; while Sir Charles Napier met with a still more favourable reception, and Mr. Pellatt was also cheered by his friends, and hooted by the supporters of Mr Locke.

The writ having been read by Mr. H D. Pritchard, the deputy returning officer, and the High Bailiff having addressed the assembly, Mr. Thomas Pocock proposed, and Mr. Mackie seconded, the nomination of Mr Apsley Pellatt; Mr. Cyrus Legg proposed, and Mr. Vickers seconded, the nomination of Sir Charles Napier; Dr. Challice proposed, and Mr. Walker seconded, the nomination of Mr. Locke.

The three candidates having addressed the crowd, a show of hands was taken, which was decidedly in favour of Sir C. Napier and Mr. Locke, notwithstanding a frantic call for every man to hold up their hands in favour of Mr Pellatt. A poll was then demanded on behalf of Mr. Pellatt, and, after a vote of thanks to the returning officer, the proceedings terminated.

The result of the poll, as stated on Monday at four o'clock was as follows—

| Napier .. 3389. | John Lock .. 3610. | | Apsley Pellatt .. 2418. |

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE

The election for the county of Buckingham was held on Tuesday at Aylesbury, when the three former members Mr. Du Pré, Mr. Cavendish, and Mr. Disraeli were re-elected without opposition. The proceedings took place at the Townhall, which was filled in every part, and the utmost good humour prevailed. One of the galleries was reserved for ladies Mrs. Disraeli was present during the proceedings.

The High Sheriff of the county (Mr. William Wroughton) presided, and, after the usual formalities, the three candidates were duly proposed and seconded. The High Sheriff then inquired whether there was any other candidate to propose, and no elector having come forward for the purpose, Mr. Du Pré, Mr. Cavendish, and Mr. Disraeli were declared duly elected (Loud cheers

Mr. Du Pré and Mr. Cavendish both returned thanks, but neither of their speeches contained anything remarkable.

Mr. Disraeli, who was met with loud cheers, after thanking the electors for having a fourth time returned him to Parliament, went on at great length to defend the conduct of the Conservative party while in office and in Opposition. Questions of the most importance of his speech were those relating to the Vienna negotiations and the popular demand for reform. With reference to the former topic he said

"We have been told that Lord Palmerston took the reins in a moment of difficulty, and carried us through a crisis with great efficiency (Hear, hear) Yes, but it should be remembered that when he took the reins he commenced negotiations for an ignominious peace ("No, no," and "Yes, yes"). He sent Lord John Russell to Vienna with instructions to negotiate for peace. I have heard it stated, and I believe it is a fact, that the instructions to Lord John Russell were drawn up by Lord Palmerston's own hand; and I think it highly probable that the most experienced statesman we have would not fail in performing such a duty. It did so happen, however, that although the negotiations were secret, somebody told me the terms of them ("Bravo, Dizzy!"), and I formed the conclusion that they would be most unsatisfactory to the people, and most prejudicial to the interests and honour of the country. My information, though accurate, was not complete, and I brought forward a motion in the House of Commons, asking it to come to the resolution that the language and uncertain conduct of her Majesty's representative at Vienna were sources of great anxiety to Parliament. That resolution, brought forward on the eve of the Whitsun-tide holidays, was defeated by a great majority of the House—a majority of 108 - and the reason was, that Lord John Russell had returned and made a warlike speech, and was supported by the Prime Minister with so much cordiality, that the House of Commons did not think that the impression I wished to convey was justifiable. But it subsequently appeared that the French Plenipotentiary who had consented to those terms, annoyed that the negotiations had failed, resigned his office. I then revealed, in my own vindication, all that had occurred, and when Parliament met after the holidays, some of the members who voted against my motion, expressed their deep regret that they had adopted that course. The consequence was, that I asked a distinguished friend of mine (Sir E. B Lytton) to bring the whole subject forward. What was the consequence? The existence of the Government was at stake, and those who would have terminated its existence had it not been that Lord John Russell saved it by making himself the voluntary scapegoat of the Government (Hear, hear). He will do Lord John Russell the justice to state that he offered to stand or fall by Lord John Russell; but as the majority would have been overwhelming, Lord John offered to be the scapegoat, and the Government was saved. In justice to Lord John Russell, it is necessary, I should say, that, in my opinion, he was not responsible for those terms, but that the responsibility rested with the Cabinet and the Prime Minister. I mention these things, as they show that we did not deviate from the patriotic course of the Opposition ,and to show that some credit is due to the Parliamentary Opposition of England during the Government of Lords Aberdeen and Palmerston."

With regard to the question of Parliamentary Reform, he said he did not believe the people were much in earnest in their demand for it. The talk we have heard during the last fortnight was more the excitement of the hustings than the expression of earnest feeling on the part of any large body of the people. The state of parties, however, was likely to give reform greater prominence than it has had lately. Then came the question as to what measure of reform we ought to have. The moderate Reformers were in favour of bit-by-bit reform; the earnest and real Reformers demanded comprehensive measures. For his part he never agreed to all bit-by bit reforms, because he found that, however plausible they might appear, they always ended in a job. As for the real Reformers, they went for electoral districts and the ballot. Having stated his objections to the first of these measures, he proceeded as follows.. "With respect to the ballot, all gentlemen considered the subject must agree that the ballot is impossible unless accompanied with a great extension of the suffrage It would be insupportable and intolerable that those who enjoy the privilege of voting should exercise it in secret, without being subject to that control and influence which the possessors of other privileges have. Admitting, then, that if you have the ballot, you must also have extension of the suffrage, you will have another important question to consider, namely, whether you will accompany the ballot with plurality of voting? Do you mean to say that the Lord Lieutenant of the country, for instance, is to have no more voice at an election than some individual in the [illegible] Would you take away the privileges of property, and say that property is to have no influence in the representation? Would you take away the privileges of property, and say that property is to have no influence in the representation? Would you take away the privileges of property, and say that property is to have no influence in the representation?

THE PARLIAMENT OUT OF DOORS.

THE constituencies both of Boroughs and of Counties have excluded from the New Parliament so many men possessed of energy and eloquence, that the country is threatened with a Parliament out of doors. So let it be! We know of no reason why such a result should be deprecated. Even if the members of the extraneous Parliament should be gifted with powers of debate more brilliant, and with powers of ratiocination more trenchant and effectual, than the legitimate Parliament of the nation, the cause of good government will not suffer. When parties are too evenly balanced, or when the distinctive marks which separate party from party are effaced or blurred, there is a tendency in Parliaments to become idle and to stagnate. When this is the case there is nothing better than a good breeze out of doors to keep the waters wholesome. Of late years this tendency has become stronger every Session—so strong, in fact, that for all useful purposes, except the voting of supplies, Parliament was gradually abdicating its right of action, and degenerating into a mere debating club. Another and more impetuous Parliament out of doors will cure it of this evil, should it have no means of cure within itself. After a lull of eleven years a good rattling storm of domestic politics will help to clear the atmosphere. Standing still in these times is virtually as bad as retrogression. The recent elections, if they have declared anything to parties and to Governments, have declared that it is time to move on. The movement, we think, will be all the brisker because certain men who love to hear themselves talk, and who are accustomed to lead or to lecture their countrymen, are deprived of the opportunity in the council-chamber of St. Stephen's.

The question of the Corn-laws unsettled the mutual relationship of Tories, Whigs, and Radicals; Conservatives and Liberals; and marshalled them into the opposing phalanxes of Protectionists and Free-traders. But, when that question was disposed of, no other of equal urgency or interest arose to fill its place and redistribute the Parliamentary combatants under their ancient banners. The question of Reform, though sometimes on the lips of orators, had no very deep seat in their affections; and just as it might have become a powerful cry, the useless French Revolution of February, 1848, occurred to distract attention from domestic to foreign politics, and to prove by its results that there might be a great deal of Reform without even the shadow of Liberty. The events which rapidly succeeded each other in France and in other Continental countries somewhat disgusted the sober British people with their fine-spun theories of Reform and Progress which had only to be drawn out to the proper tenuity to snap asunder, and leave a clear arena to the first Despot—booted, spurred, and sabred—who had audacity enough to vault into the vacant place and take possession. These revolutions and counter-revolutions, these short-lived and tyrannical Republics, followed by longer-lived and more tyrannical Autocracies, led as an infallible consequence to that general disturbance of the political relations of the European States towards each other, which, in its turn, produced the attack of Russia on the independence and the very existence of Turkey, and that great War to resist the evil-doer which so sorely tried the temper of the British people. But, having passed successfully, if not gloriously, through that ordeal, and having escaped, by the administrative sagacity and patriotic boldness of Lord Palmerston, from the national humiliation which for many a dark day in the Crimea seemed but too imminent, and being freed in consequence from any apprehension of a renewed European war, the people of the British Islands once more turned their attention to domestic affairs. The opportunity of passing a verdict was no sooner afforded them, than they deprived of their seats in Parliament the most able and pertinacious of the men who had systematically striven to weaken the hands of the Government in its foreign wars. Mr. Gladstone himself, the arch-arguer whose eloquence "darkens counsel" in the most triumphant manner known in modern times, would have shared the fate of Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and Mr Milner Gibson, if he had asked the suffrages of any constituency but that of the University of Oxford or of a rotten borough; and Sir J. Graham, had he gone out of Carlisle, might have begged for a seat in vain from any popular constituency. With few exceptions, whenever a member of the last Parliament with a crotchet about the possibility of universal peace, or about the wickedness of all war, has ventured to solicit re-election, he has been defeated. Wherever an impracticable member, always carping at others, never of himself suggesting anything feasible, and making it a rule to deny the propriety and the feasibility of everything proposed by wiser men, has ventured to face the electors he has been consigned to private life, as the punishment of his conceit and want of common sense. The people have declared for common sense as well as for common honesty, and the result is a Parliament stronger in its Liberal element than any Parliament since the days of the first Earl Grey; and the delegation to comparative obscurity of more than a hundred gentlemen, who were not acute enough to understand their countrymen, or generous enough to sympathise with them.

Of these hundred, perhaps some twenty or thirty of the ablest, the most eloquent, and the most energetic and honest, with Mr. Cobden at their head, will form the "Parliament out of doors." It is possible that Mr. Cobden, who, notwithstanding his errors of judgment, was an ornament to the Legislature, will be enabled ere long to procure a seat. But, even in his default, the external Parliament will not be powerless to look out leaders.

The vice of the late House of Commons was want of zeal in the public cause, and that vice was to a large extent attributable to a want of wholesome agitation for some great and well-defined object of domestic policy. The object has been found. The policy has been declared; and the able men who have been rejected from Parliament are desirous to set foot once more within the well-beloved precincts—admission to which gives dignity as well as power—they will be to accomplish their end by constitutional and energetic agitation in favour of another medium act of Reform. Some of them have already declared that, if the people could freely elect their representatives, they would be members of the new, as they were of the old Parliament. Let them try what Reform will do for them, and they may live to confer a real service on their country.

THE CASTLE OF ST. ELMO, NAPLES.

We receive another of our artistic Correspondent's views in Naples, which, in the political horizon, may be considered at this moment to possess interest equal to that of any European capital. The Castle of St. Elmo, or St. Erasmo, stands on the most lofty point in the neighbourhood of the capital, and commands it completely with its guns. Some uncertainty attaches to the date of its construction, but probably it was built about the middle of the fourteenth century. The mountain on which it stands has been at various times called Monte Falerno, Santo Erasmo, and Santo Martino; but St. Erasmo has given its name to the castle. The Viceroy of Charles V much enlarged it and perhaps all that we now see belongs to the sixteenth century. In 1587 it suffered much from lightning, which falling upon it ignited the powder-magazine and a great portion of the fortress together with 15 persons, was destroyed. Though it commands the city, it would be of little use were an enemy behind it, as it is itself commanded by the heights of Camaldoli. With a full knowledge of this, therefore, the country about it has been fortified in order to guard against such a contingency. At present Castel St. Elmo is well provided with munitions of war, and is in the hands of the Swiss who are the masters of the city, and very recently its strength has been much increased by one of those crimes which, soon or later, bring down on the perpetrators the curse of all the other subjects.

On the 15th May 1848, the red flag was displayed from its heights, and the cannon sent forth its destructive volleys into the devoted city which lay beneath. In certain eventualities it is prepared to enact another 15th May. St. Elmo is used at times as a place of confinement for State prisoners, and if some of its presents to me speak without exaggeration, I can understand that the dungeons must drive such tortures to despair. Some of the cells are but a few feet square, and without light or air. Here, in the days of the Inquisition, many a victim of religious persecution has languished and died. Here, in more modern times, many a victim of political persecution has languished and died. Here, at the present moment, many a victim of political persecution is languishing and dying. Here, in the future, many a victim of political persecution will languish and die. Such dungeons cannot be opened, nor the existence of places of confinement in connection with ordinary dwellings, and yet, who that looks upon that picturesque mediæval edifice, and marks with an artistic eye in what bold relief it stands out against the blue canvas of the sky, would ever dream of the sufferings which are experienced within its walls? Still more, who that, standing upon the height of the castle looks down on the smiling gulf-like bay which bounds around from the one point to the other, would ever dream that there could be imposed more hateful, and, as it is to many, appalling tax than to Dante Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise? Yet such are the blessings which are there so abundantly diffused?

MIDDLESEX.

The polling took place on Monday, but it did not excite much interest, as it was plain from the beginning that Viscount Chelsea had little or no chance against Lord Robert Grosvenor and Mr. Hanbury. The ceremony of declaring the numbers polled took place on Wednesday, at noon, at the hustings, Brentford. There was a very large assemblage, but the crowd was in far better humour than at the nomination, and the proceedings passed off without any confusion beyond the ordinary uproar and badinage allowable on such occasions. Mr. Sheriff Mechi and Mr. Sheriff Keats, accompanied by Mr Under Sheriff Crosley, attended on the hustings at twelve o'clock, and shortly afterwards an imposing cavalcade made its appearance in the little square or market-place in front of the Court-house Lord Robert Grosvenor, who was accompanied by the Right Hon. Mr. Fitzroy and two or three other friends, drove up in an open carriage drawn by four white horses, with postilions in light blue jackets and white gloves. Mr. Hanbury and his friends followed in a similar cavalcade, and several carriages, "drags," and other conveyances brought up the rear. There was also a band, and a procession of voters carrying banners, on which were inscribed the words, "Down with the Tories, they are the people's enemies;" "He that taxeth the bread, the poor shall curse him," "Down with the monopolists and robbers, the oppressors of the poor;" and other legends of an equally amiable and conciliatory character.

Lord Chelsea arrived in a very unceremonious manner, but was loudly cheered by his friends when recognised on the hustings; Lord Robert Grosvenor was met with cheers and counter-hisses, and cries of "Hyde-park;" but Mr. Hanbury received a general ovation.

Mr Sheriff Mechi, who was dressed in his official costume, and made what Mr. Samuel Pepys calls a "brave show," with his gold chain, Court dress, and magnificent equipage, then announced the result of the poll, as follows:—

|---|---|
| Mr. Hanbury .. .. .. .. | 5426 |
| Lord Robert Grosvenor .. .. | 5387 |
| Lord Chelsea .. .. .. .. | 2228 |

(Loud cheers). He, therefore, declared Mr Robert Hanbury, jun., and the Right Hon. Lord Robert Grosvenor duly elected to serve in Parliament for the county of Middlesex. (Loud cheers

The two members and the defeated candidate addressed the crowd at some length; after which Lord R Grosvenor and Mr. Hanbury, accompanied by a great number of their friends wearing bows of ribbon and other party devices, drove to Isleworth and back in procession to Brentford, this being the manner in which the members are "chaired" in Middlesex.

THE MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.

As affording a guide to public expectation in regard to the probable occupations of the new Parliament for the first week after its meeting, we reprint an extract from the record of the last House when it met under similar circumstances:—

(From "Votes of the House of Commons.")

November 4, 1852. House met at two p m, and went to the Lords The Lords Commissioners directed the House to proceed to the election of a Speaker, and to present him at two o'clock to-morrow for the Royal approbation. Mr Shaw Lefevre, on motion of Mr. Palmer, seconded by Lord Robert Grosvenor, took the chair. The Chancellor of the Exchequer then congratulated the Speaker elect. The House adjourned at three.

November 5th—House met at two and went to the Lords. Her Majesty approved of the choice the House had made. The Speaker took the oaths alone. Several members also took the oaths. House adjourned at four.

November 6th. House met at two. Several members took the oaths. Adjourned at four.

November 8th. Same proceedings. Members took the oaths.

November 9th.—Same proceedings.

November 10th. Same proceedings.

November 11th.—The House met at one o'clock Message to attend her Majesty in the Lords. House went. On return, the Speaker reported her Majesty's Speech. Address moved by Lord Lovaine, seconded by Mr. E. Egerton, and agreed to. Adjourned at 5.30 p m.

THE FINSBURY ELECTION PETITION. Mr. Edwin James, Q.C., has been retained to appear in support of the petition against Mr Cox's return.

REFRESHMENTS TO VOTERS.—According to the 23rd section of the 17th and 18th Vict., c 102, it is declared that refreshments given to a voter on the day of nomination or polling shall be deemed illegal, and the person so offending shall forfeit the sum of 40s. for each offence to any person who shall sue for the same, with full costs of suit.

THE DIVISION ON MR. COBDEN'S MOTION. In our list of Members returned, last week, we included Mr. Wyvill among the Opposition. He ought to have had M instead of O added to his name, as he voted with Ministers.

THE MISSING AUSTRALIAN STEAMER.—The last accounts of the Oneida are to the 4th of February, on which day she left King George's Sound a port just within the south-west point of Australia, and to which she had kept her time to the day. For her safety there are no apprehensions, but that her machinery has met with some derangement there is little doubt, for, having kept for time in the hardest part of her passage, the performance of the rest could be calculated to a ninety. Had her machinery become deranged shortly after rounding Cape Leuwin, the south west extremity of Australia, she would probably make for Swan River, as the nearest settlement, and on the delivery of the Oneida's mail's on Monday we shall know how far this may be from the dates thence. She may, however, have met with the wreck after reaching midway between Cape Leuwin and Ceylon, in which case she might creep on to reach the latter native canvas, but, failing her ability to do so, the Island of MAURITIUS, though more distant, would be under her lee, and for that she could proceed. The Cumbrae advises us that the mail-steamer which the colonists had put on the line between Mauritius and Suez, at their own expense, without any aid from Government, had arrived at Suez with dates from Mauritius of the 1st of March, but without any accounts of the Oneida Her non arrival at that island we take to account, as it is the last place she would bear away for, her commander knowing he could always reach it, being dead to leeward on nearly the whole of his track. There is still another course that he may have pursued, that is to steer direct for Aden, for which the winds would be more favourable than for Ceylon. As to any apprehension for the safety of the ship and her living freight, none whatever need be entertained in this delay, as any accident which would deprive her of the aid of her machinery would involve more than the loss of this much time. Liverpool Albion.

AN EXTRAORDINARY TRIAL. A strange case was tried at the Oxford Assizes last Monday. The action was brought by the Abbé Roux, a French priest, lately in a cure at Chelsea, against Cardinal Wiseman, to recover damages, assessed at £1000, for breach of a contract, upon which the plaintiff alleged that the defendant had received a document signed by the Princess Letitia Bonaparte niece to the Emperor of France, which document he the Cardinal, had either lost or disposed of in some other way. The document in question was an acknowledgment on the part of the lady that she owed ROUX 25,000 f., which she desired her children would pay as a "sacred debt." The facts were briefly these: The Princess Letitia Bonaparte, the sister of Prince Lucien Bonaparte, who, he alleges, had undertaken to endeavour to obtain payment from Mr. Wyse, but had not done so, and now the paper was not forthcoming The plaintiff, who had been examination days for hands several times that he had given the security for 25,000 f. into the hands of Cardinal Wiseman in 1854, and that he had never been able to get it back. On the other hand, Cardinal Wiseman said, his impression was that he had given back the security in question, along with other documents, to M. ROUX. The Princess Letitia Bonaparte stated positively in her examination that, instead of owing M. ROUX anything, he was in her debt to the extent of 320 f. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with £300 damages.

A NEW CAB.—Messrs Field and Sons, of Fore street, have patented an ingenious invention, which they form a reversible and ventilating cap, which is likely to be of great utility to naval and military officers. The invention consists of a combination of any two different materials, forming two caps in one, and capable of changing—for example, from a cloth cap to an oilskin, in an instant, without interference with the inside in any way, and is perfectly ventilated whichever way it may be worn.

THE COURT.

The Queen continues in full health, and enjoys daily drives in the Paris and western suburbs of the metropolis. On Tuesday her Majesty received congratulatory visits from the Duchess of Kent and the Princesses of Hohenlohe Langenburg, on the occasion of Prince Leopold's birthday. On the same day his Excellency Ferouk Khan had an interview with Prince Albert, at Buckingham Palace, to take leave, on a brief visit to Paris, where his presence is required to complete the ratification of the treaty.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Brendalbane, Earl Spencer, Lord Panmure, the Right Hon. Sir George Grey, the Right Hon. H. Labouchere, the Right Hon. Sir Charles Wood, Lieutenant-General Sir George Bowles, Colonel the Hon. A. Gordon, and Captain the Hon. J. Denman have had the honour of dining at the Royal table during the week

The Duke and Duchess of the Royal Family have visited several public and private establishments this week

His Serene Highness the Prince of Leiningen arrived at the residence of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Clarence House, St. James's, on Monday, from Portsmouth. The Prince dined with her Majesty, at Buckingham Palace, on Wednesday.

His Excellency Feroukh Khan, Special Envoy from the Shah of Persia, left town on Thursday for Paris. His Excellency will return to London next month.

MAUNDAY THURSDAY.—The interesting ceremony of the distribution of her Majesty's Maunday took place at the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, on Thursday, at two o'clock. The Bishop of Oxford officiated, assisted by Dr Jelf, Sub-Almoner, and Mr Josiah Hanby, secretary of her Majesty's Almonry.

IN THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of last week we recorded a splendid banquet given by the Scots Fusilier Guards at the London Tavern, on the 25th March; but omitted to state that the banquet was a farewell dinner to Lieut Colonel Frederick C. A. Stephenson, on the occasion of his appointment to the post of Assistant Adjutant-General to the Staff under orders for China by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge

HEALTH OF LONDON.—In the week that ended on Saturday the total number of deaths registered in London was 1236, of which 639 were deaths of males, and 616 those of females. In the ten years 1847-56 the average number of deaths was 1133, but for comparison with the deaths of last week, which occurred in an increased population, the average must be raised proportionally to the increase, in which case it will become 1311. The deaths now returned are therefore less by 75 than would have occurred if the average rate of mortality had prevailed. The deaths from pulmonary diseases, which in the two previous weeks were 292 and 278, were last week 264, the corrected average for the ten weeks corresponding with last week being 273. Last week the births of 836 boys and 802 girls, in all 1638 children, were registered in London In the ten corresponding weeks of the year 1847-56 the average number was 1555.

WHITTINGTON CLUB.—We understand that the ninth anniversary ball of this excellent institution will take place this year at the Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen-street, on Easter Tuesday, and that there will be a large gathering to meet the friends and president of the institution, Mr Sheriff Mechi, who, with Mrs Mechi and a party of friends, are expected to attend. It is gratifying to hear that the exertions of the committee to secure the reopening of the institution which, it will be recollected, was some time since destroyed by fire—will be shortly crowned with success, and that a society so calculated to confer substantial benefits upon the community will be speedily again in operation.

A MID-DAY HALT ON THE RIO TROMBUTAS, BRAZIL.

THERE are men of Anglo-Saxon race inhabiting the mountains and wildernesses of America who subsist by hunting, and imitate the lives of the Red Indians, whose tribes have been nearly extirpated. Of these the two most celebrated are John Cheney and Adam Vandever, whose adventures are pleasantly described by Mr. Charles Lanman, in his work on the "Wilds of the United States," from which we shall make some extracts. John Cheney was born in New Hampshire, but spent his boyhood on the shores of Lake Champlain, and has resided during thirteen years in the forests of Adirondac. The district bearing that name is situated on the extreme head-waters of the Hudson, in the counties of Essex and Hamilton, and about forty miles west of Lake Champlain. The mountains vary from five hundred to five thousand feet in height, and, with few exceptions, are covered with dense forests. Here resides John Cheney, his wife, and one child. A cow supplies them with milk, and a couple of hunting-dogs are the companions of the sportsman. He was forty-seven years of age when Mr. Lanman saw him, and he gave the following account of himself:—

EXAMINATION AT THE ADMIRALTY

A LIFE IN JEOPARDY. A NIGHT SCENE ON THE RIVER SUSQUEHANA, PENNSYLVANIA

You ask me if I ever hunt on Sundays: No, Sir, I do not. I have always been able to kill enough on week days to give me a comfortable living. Since I came to live among the Adirondacs I have killed six hundred deer, four hundred sable, nineteen moose, twenty-eight bears, six wolves, seven wild cats, thirty otters, one panther, and one beaver.

The beaver was the last ever taken in the State of New York, and it took Cheney three years to capture this wary animal; but he caught him at last by fixing a trap under the water, in which the beaver was drowned. In one of our Illustrations the hunters are seen killing deer by torchlight, at which treacherous mode of warfare Cheney is indignant. [...]

They have several ways of killing them in this quarter, and some of their ways are so infernal mean, I'm surprised there should be any deer left in the country. In the first place, there's the still-hunting fashion, where you lie in ambush near a salt-lick, and shoot the poor creatures when they're not thinking of you. And there's the beastly manner of blinding them with a torchlight, when they come into the lakes to cool themselves, and get away from the flies, during the warm nights of summer. Now, I say, that no decent man will take this advantage of wild game, unless he is in a starving condition. The only manly way to kill deer is by "driving" them, as I do, with a couple of hounds.

This experienced hunter describes the cry of the deer when in the agonies of death as the most awful sound he ever heard, and he mentions as a curious fact "that when a deer is at all frightened he cannot stand upon smooth ice: while, at the same time, when not afraid of being caught, he will not only walk, but actually trot, across a lake as smooth as glass.

We will now introduce to our readers Adam Vandever, the hunter of Tallulah, celebrated for its falls—Tallulah in the Cherokee language signifying "the terrible." The river rises among the Alleghany Mountains, and is a tributary of the Savannah. At the mouth of the Tallulah chasm resides Vandever, in a log cabin, in the centre of a beautiful valley hemmed in on all sides by wild and abrupt mountains. He is a native of South Carolina, spent his early manhood in the wilds of Kentucky, and has passed the last thirty years of his life in the wilderness of Georgia. When Mr. Lanman met him he was sixty years of age, living with his third wife, and claims to be the father of thirty children. His ideas of honourable sporting are very different from those of John Cheney, as he pursues but two methods "fire-lighting" and "still-hunting." Mr. Lanman gives the following account of him:—

His favourite game is the deer, but he is not particular, and secures the fur of every four-legged creature which may happen to cross his path. The largest number of skins that he ever brought home at one time was six hundred, among which were those of the bear, the black and grey wolf, the panther, the wild cat, the fox, the coon, and some dozen other varieties. He computes the entire number of deer that he has killed in his lifetime at four thousand.

The hairbreadth escapes of this extraordinary man from a painful death partake of the marvellous. We select a couple which may astonish our readers, and perhaps excite their incredulity.

He was encamped upon one of the loftiest mountains in Union County. It was near the twilight hour, and he heard the howl of a wolf. With a view of ascertaining the direction whence it came he climbed upon an immense boulder rock dweighing, perhaps, fifty tons; which stood on the brow of a steep hillside. While standing upon this boulder he suddenly felt a swinging sensation, and to his astonishment he found that it was about to make a fearful plunge into the ravine half a mile below him. As fortune would have it, the limb of an oak-tree drooped over the rock, and as the rock started from its foundation he seized the limb and thereby saved his life.

The boulder rushed down the mountain, and the hunter alighted on the spot it had vacated. This was the only occasion on which Vandever experienced the sensation of fear. Here is another incident of a similar perilous character:—

On another occasion he fired at a large buck near the brow of a precipice some thirty feet high which hangs over one of the pools in Tallulah river. On seeing the buck drop he took it for granted that he was about to die, when he approached with the purpose of cutting the animal's throat. To his great surprise, however, the buck suddenly sprung to his feet and made a tremendous rush at the hunter, with a view of throwing him off the ledge. Judge what was the remarkable, the animal wounded in its effort, though not until Vandever had obtained a fair hold of the buck's antlers, when the twain performed a somersault into the pool below. The buck made its escape, and Vandever was not seriously injured in any particular.

Another famous hunting-ground in the United States lies on the shores of the Lower Mississippi—that river extending from New Orleans to the mouth of the Missouri, a distance of about twelve hundred miles. It is a dense region with dismal swamps of cypress wood and cypress, where the panther and the wolf roam in native freedom, and the eagle sweeps upon its prey undisturbed by the presence of man. On either side of the boundary line the forty-ninth parallel, between the United States and what are called the Hudson's Bay territories, from the river Snake on the west up to the Saskatchewan, herds of wild buffaloes afford ample sport both to the Indians and Americans; the former attacking them with the bow and arrow and the spear, the latter with the rifle-pistol, as shown in our Illustration. Seal-hunting is a favourite and exciting sport on the St. Lawrence, the harpoon being used on the water and the rifle on shore; and it is recorded of one man that in a single tide he slaughtered one hundred of those animals with a tomahawk.

In the three accompanying illustrations of this stirring sport the weapon employed is the revolver invented by Colonel Colt. His case shows a completeness of practical adaptation combined with the abstract inventive quality which has had an immediate result in his personal fortunes. The man of genius may invent, but only the man of business and combination could have applied so many operations of machinery already known to his invention as Colonel Colt has done.

Colonel Colt, a native of Connecticut, United States, began life, at the early age of thirteen, in a seafaring capacity on board a vessel bound for the East Indies; and some years afterwards, when still very young, he began to turn his attention to the deriving some means of producing a repeating fire-arm suitable for such a country as America, where on the vast western frontier the settler requires to protect himself. In our late memoir of Mr. Hart, the American sculptor, we alluded to a necessity the settler was under of being his own smith and carpenter at times: he must, in fact, be his own policeman—hence the necessity of a protective weapon of a formidable nature. The double-barrelled gun and pistol are both imperfect arms, inasmuch as when once fired the process of reloading gives time to the assailant to attack in the interval. Thus, in the Florida war the Seminole Indians who handled the rifle quite as well as the Americans, being mounted, rushed down on detached parties, and, having first drawn their fire, would dispatch them before they had time to reload. No sooner, however, did they see, to their astonishment, that six shots followed one after another without the delay of reloading, than they at once considered their tactics as thenceforth useless, and came to an accommodation with the Government.

The idea of a repeating fire-arm is an old one. A matchlock of the fifteenth century, having a revolving breech with four chambers, mounted on an arbor and parallel with and welded to the barrel is in the armoury of the Tower. Two similar ones are in the Musée d'Artillerie at Paris. Others of Oriental origin, are now in Europe. In the Museum of the Hôtel de Cluny, at Paris, is an arm of the seventeenth century with a pyrites lock and eight chambers, with ignitson somewhat on the principle of the Prussian needle-gun; the object being to prevent a simultaneous discharge from all the chambers. Another pistol in the United Service Museum has six chambers, and is of the same date, nomenclature, as the time of Charles I.; but this arm possesses no means of regulating the contact of the breech and the barrel, so as to prevent the spread of lateral fire and the simultaneous discharge of all the chambers. Infernal machines without number, down to that of Fieschi, have been constructed, but have the character of the simultaneous, and not the serial or repeating, discharge.

The embryo invention of Colonel Colt himself was that of a number of collated barrels revolving upon a spindle by the act of cocking the lock, and it was the very weight and inconvenience of this new, yet formidable arm, that led Colonel Colt to place the principle of the revolution not in the barrels, but in a rotatory cylinder with chambers, and only one barrel. This idea was superior to the other in a geometrical ratio, not only by the abbreviation of the length of the heavy multiple apertures, but, the weight being thrown close to the hand, the large expenditure of leverage [illegible]

As regards the mechanism of repetition, the trigger action of the revolver of Deane and Adams is pronounced to be the most rapid by the writer of an elaborate article on "Gunmaking," in the now publishing edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica;" but it is not by any means so safe a weapon as Colt's; anything catching the trigger sending the charge off, as in the case of the lamentable accident in the Crimea, where Mr. Gavin, an eminent surgeon, was shot. Mr. Colt's revolvers require the hammer to be drawn up every time of firing; both he and the writer in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" consider every pistol having the trigger action to be an unsafe weapon. One feature of Colonel Colt's is worthy of notice, and that is the admirable simplicity and effective power of the lever ramrod, which is part of his patent, saving much time in the loading of the chambers, and sending the charge right home with perfect ease.

Among the experiences of the Colt revolver we know none more interesting than those of Mr. Catlin, the celebrated American explorer and sportsman, or more decisive as to its efficacy. While descending the River Trombutas, in Brazil, in a canoe, Catlin was in the habit of passing the mid-day heats under the shade on shore. One day he was roasting a wild hog for dinner and saw a large panther a couple of rods off playing with the legs of his companion who was asleep, and lifting them up with his paws. Catlin went cautiously down for his revolver rifle which had been left in the boat. But the panther had put down his head behind the sleeping body, so Catlin giving a whistle, the panther raised his head just the height he wanted, and immediately received a ball between the eyes. That the sleeper, on awakening, was astonished at his simultaneous release from the arms of Morpheus and a panther, may be well believed. (S. Illustration.)

Another instance of the revolver principle applied to the rifle is in what is called "water hunting" in that part of North America in which Mr. Catlin describes himself as having been "raised." In the warm nights of summer the deer come down to the rivers to bathe and feed on the aquatic plants. The difficulty with the ordinary rifle was that only one shot could be got at them, from their rapidity and shyness, they are out of sight in a moment. Mr. Catlin, on one occasion, returning to the scenes of his boyhood on the shores of the Susquehanna, organised a party on a fair night, and seven deer were brought down by the revolver rifle, other deer having gone off bleeding.

Medicine in illness is considered the summum bonum among the Indians. In a buffalo chase which took place on the north fork of the Platte River, out of five shots which Catlin fired right and left in immediate succession while on full gallop, the fifth proved useful in bringing down unwieldy buffaloes. Hence the highest metaphor expressive of excellence was applied to Colt's Revolver by the Indians, and to this day it is called, in the language of that district, "the medicine gun."

THE CLOCK-TOWER AND SPEAKER'S RESIDENCE, NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

THE view chosen by our Artist for his representation of the Clock-Tower is the river front facing the Thames, from whose banks it rises majestically, and joins the residence of the Speaker of the House of Commons. This tower is an elegant object from whichever point it may be viewed. Its grand and graceful proportions can only be estimated by an appeal to figures, and we therefore give a general idea of them. The total height of the tower to the top of the finial is 310 feet. The roof is composed of copper, gal[vanised]; the finial or top is of wrought copper, gilt; and the total weight of the roof is estimated at 300 tons. The walls are of brick, faced with stone, and are three feet and a half in thickness. The area within the walls is occupied by a shaft for the weights and pendulum for the clock, and an air-shaft. There are also eleven stories of rooms and a staircase. One of the rooms will be appropriated for the confinement of those members who may be placed in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. These rooms are all fireproof. From their windows there is a pleasant view of the river and the roofs and crocketed towers of the long pile of building stretching to Abingdon-street. The foundation of this tower is laid upon a bed of concrete upwards of fifteen feet deep; the brickwork commences at about four-teen feet below the level of Parliament-street, upon the top of the concrete. The extraordinary thickness of this concrete foundation will not surprise the reader when he considers the great weight of the walls themselves; the weight of the roof; the ponderous great bell, and the four quarter bells; the necessary supports for the bells, and the large machinery of the great clock and its dials.

The walls have been erected under two contractors—the lower part to the Clock-Tower, we believe, by Mr. Grissell; the upper by Mr. Jay, the contractor at the present time for the New Palace works. The sculptural decorations are by Mr. John Thomas, of the Alpha-road; and the metal roof by Mr. Jabez James. The ornamental work in metal is partly by James and Hardman, of Birmingham. The gilding is by Mr. Crace. Of the Speaker's residence adjoining we shall have occasion to speak when its interior is finished. It is an elegant pile, corresponding in height and proportions to the Abingdon-street end, which is used for the Lord Chancellor's residence, and the attendant officials.

The accompanying View has been drawn and engraved by J. and A. Willams.

The sky still continues much overcast, and the weather showery and unsettled. Rain was falling heavily and continuously throughout the evening of April 4, and a new light shower occurred on the days of the 2nd, 3rd, and 8th, and on the afternoon of the 7th. The wind was blowing freshly from the S.S.E. and S.S.W. on the day of the 2nd, but it has been otherwise calm. It was also fresh on the evenings of April 3rd, 4th, and 7th; and partly so on the days of the 7th and 8th. A corona was noticed round the moon on the night of the 2nd. The horizon was misty on the days of April 6th and 7th.

The daily means are obtained from observations made at 6h. and 10h. a.m., and 2h., 6h., and 10h. p.m. on each day, except Sunday, when the first observation is omitted. The corrections for diurnal variation are taken from the Tables of Mr. Glaisher. The "Dew-point" and "Relative Humidity" are calculated, from observations of the dry and wet bulb thermometers, by Dr. Apjohn's Formula and Dalton's Tables of the Tension of Vapour. The movement of the wind is given by a self-recording Robinson's Anemometer, the amount stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

BRUHNS' COMET.—The comet detected by M. Bruhns at Berlin, on March 26, appears to be a more important discovery than was at first imagined, there being but little doubt that it is a reappearance of the comet found by M. Pigott in February, 1846, and which was expected to come again into sight in May or June of this year. This comet was sought for in vain during the winter of 1851; but its great distance from the Earth, and the short time it remained above the horizon after sunset, or could be seen before sunrise, made the search very difficult and uncertain on that occasion; and its position in the sky was otherwise very doubtful. The orbit of this comet bears a strong resemblance to those of 1532 and 1661, which were previously surmised by Halley to be one and the same; but, if so, it has considerably diminished in size and lustre since those periods, the comet of 1661 being described as having a head three times the size of Jupiter, and with a tail of ten degrees in length; whilst that of 1661 had a tail of five degrees in length. The comet has become somewhat brighter during the last fortnight, and is faintly visible in an ordinary two-feet telescope furnished with a low power. A considerable condensation of light is now perceived at the centre, instead of the diffuse appearance presented in the Engraving in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of April 4. The right ascension of the comet on April 11th is 3h. 34 m., and the North Polar distance 57 deg. 44 min. On April 16th the right ascension will be 3h. 22m., and the North Polar distance 47 deg. 1 min. On the evening of April 14th it will be situated close to Epsilon Persei. It arrived at perihelion on March 24th; but it was not expected before the latter end of June. This is the fourth comet of short period whose return is known with certainty, the others being Encke's, Biela's, and Faye's. The period of Bruhns' comet is 2556 days. J. B.

CARLISLE CATHEDRAL.—Through an error of the engraver of the illustration at page 274 it is designated as the Church of Carlisle Cathedral, instead of, as it should be, a small portion of the Church. The cathedral is dedicated to the "Holy and Undivided Trinity," and not to St. Mary as you state; the Priory, which was suppressed in 1540, was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin; and the nave of the Cathedral is at present used as the Parish Church of St. Mary's: hence, perhaps, the error.—From a Correspondent.

FRENCH PATRONAGE OF SCIENCE.—On the invitation, and under the auspices of the Emperor of the French, Mr. Thomas Allan, of London, has come over here to submit to a scientific commission, appointed by the Emperor, an electro-magnetic engine of Mr Allan's invention, which solves, I am assured, the difficult problem of the application of electricity to the movement of machinery. Mr Allan has received every encouragement from the Imperial Government, every facility from the local officials. His engines are now at work at the engine manufactory of M. Call, whither scientific men, anxious to test this new motive power, are flocking to witness the experiments. Napoleon I. was greatly interested in this scientific problem, and the present Emperor is not less so, and is, I hear, about to order a practical application, as an experiment, to a locomotive engine.—Paris Correspondent of the Morning Post.

ADVICES from Toulon state that the arrival of the Grand Duke Constantine is fixed for the 22nd inst. Preparations are going on very actively in the port and around for the reception of the Prince, who is intended to be very brilliant. A squadron of war steamers will start to meet the Prince, and will accompanies the Grand Duke

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

THE intelligent and unintelligent inhabitants of Edinburgh seem to rejoice in hot and cold fits of literary enthusiasm not to be paralleled in any other city in the three kingdoms. Auld Reekie, as represented by Ebony Blackwood, has in Maga of this month a long, and perhaps unnecessary, remonstrance with Charles Dickens. Some four months ago all Holyrood and the Canongate was up in arms against the living Mr. Thackeray, and in favour of Mary Queen of Scots, beheaded at Fotheringay, we are afraid to say (without book) how many years since. But mark the change. In this very month all Edinburgh that was up in arms against Mr. Thackeray has had a more sensible fit, and all the well-informed joined in doing honour to Mr. Thackeray at a public dinner given to the great novelist in "Scotia's darling seat." The novelist's two speeches are both admirable; and we are assured by those who were present that they are not too well reported.

The youngest man of the great brewery brewage in London has this week been returned to Parliament to represent Middlesex "to wit;" and only last week the oldest representative of the brewers of London died, in Piccadilly, at the great age of ninety-three. Mr. Hanbury—Truman and Co.—has been returned for the metropolitan county of Middlesex; and Miss Thrale, Viscountess Keith—the daughter of Thrale's entire (now Barclay's) passed from among us. Lady Keith is frequently mentioned in Johnson's letters to the mother of Lady Keith. Lady Keith was the last survivor of all who are mentioned in Boswell's great work. Without any pretensions to literature, she was essentially literary—thanks to Dr. Johnson and James Boswell. But she had another claim to be mentioned in a column of talk about literature and art—she knew Sam. Johnson and she refused Sam. Rogers.

Manchester has this year absorbed much of the interest which the lovers of art extend—always with pleasure—to Trafalgar-square. Manchester will prove such an enlarged casket of all that is valuable from Cimabue to Mr. Leighton, that the millions who must flock to Manchester will afterwards run—not, we fear, to Trafalgar square, but—to trout-streams and the sea-side. But Sir Charles Eastlake and Co. will not lose by this all-important exhibition, which Manchester is to show so lavishly and so well.

The mention of the excellent President of the Royal Academy reminds us—pleasantly enough—that a very able man, an antagonist to the Royal Academy and to the National Gallery, has been returned by a large majority to Parliament, to represent the important constituency of Brighton. Mr. William Conngham (a new M.P.) is a gentleman well versed in art, and one anxious, and now additionally able, to make our National Gallery what a British National Gallery ought to be.

What is Lord Broughton about? And what is to be the result of those many sittings of the committee for determining the site of the new National Gallery? Artists allege—and authors fall into their way of thinking—that this Royal Commission will be a piece of huge blue-bookism, swamping a good Gallery by its members listening with large and idle ears to every wild proposition that talkative and foolish witnesses insist, in frothy pertinacity, to carry out. Is this the case. Sir John Cam Hobhouse?

Is Mr. Ruskin to be Professor of Poetry at Oxford? Is Mr. Ruskin Tom Warton? Oxford would have a difficulty in finding a better man to represent the Nine Muses in her cathedral city than Mr. Ruskin. It is true that he is not a rhymer, but he is a poet, one "sown by nature," and most unquestionably a full-stringed bird of "poetic prose." A great poet tells us—

> Of little use the man, you may suppose,
> Who says in verse what others say in prose.

But Mr. Ruskin says in poetic prose what clever men attempt to say fruitlessly in profitless verse.

Well, not another word from us against any Dean and Chapter, most certainly not against the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. The new Dean and the old Chapter have lent the Jerusalem Chamber portrait of King Richard the Second (the earliest authentic portrait on board or canvas of an English Sovereign) to the Gallery of British Portraits in the Manchester Exhibition. Other Deans and other Chapters should go and do likewise.

The literary renown of Scotland is not maintained by living men at the same high rank to which it was elevated in the bygone days of Sir Walter Scott and Professor Wilson; and Edinburgh is no longer the metropolis of literature. We rejoice to see that Scotchmen are becoming aware of the falling off, and that they are making an effort (somewhat better than talking of the wrongs of the Unicorn) to restore Scottish literature to its ancient lustre. To aid in this object there has been formed a "Scottish Literary Institute" to promote generally the encouragement of literature in Scotland, and to include in one association the cultivators of literature connected with this portion of the United Kingdom, so as to conduce to mutual co-operation and friendly intercourse among the members; to provide a fund for the relief of literary persons in indigent circumstances; to provide chambers in Edinburgh for the meetings of the institute, which shall be patent to members as a place of literary resort; to furnish means of obtaining literary information to members, especially to those residing at a distance from public libraries; to secure the delivery of lectures, from time to time, on useful and interesting subjects, in the principal towns; and to establish correspondence with learned individuals and societies in foreign countries, for the purpose of literary inquiry and information. The president of the society is Mr. Alexander Baillie Cochrane; and the vice-presidents are Sir James Stuart Menteth, Bart., Professor Blackie, Edinburgh; Robert Bald, F.R.S.E., Edinburgh; and Charles Mackay, LL.D., F.S.A., London. The association already numbers more than a hundred influential members, and will, no doubt, prove both successful and useful.

THE NEW REFORM BILL.—At an entertainment given to Mr R. Hall, M.P., Recorder of Doncaster, by Mr. G. Dunn, Mayor of that borough, on Wednesday, Mr Beckett Denison, M.P. for the West Riding, in reply to a complimentary toast, said he had now been elected for the West Riding for the fourth and, he believed, the last time. No, no! He said he did not regret it because he felt that in the first place he had arrived at the eleventh hour of his life, and in the next because he believed that before another general election the West Riding would be cut up into smaller divisions under a new Reform Bill. He would not offer any objection to such a measure as that, for he confessed that a constituency numbering some 37,000 voters was too large for any two members to do justice to. He understood that the time had arrived for introducing some measure of Parliamentary Reform, and he should certainly vote for the second reading of such a measure, unless—which he did not expect—it should go too far. In that measure of Reform Doncaster would in all probability be included as one of the new boroughs authorised to send a member, if not two members, to Parliament for he found on looking over the statistics of population that Doncaster, Rotherham and Keighley were, in point of numbers, the three largest unrepresented towns. Mr Hall, in returning thanks for the toast of his health said in the present state of political parties it would be absurd for him to enter into any pledges; but he might say this, he should vote for the second reading of the expected Reform Bill, be it what it might. He was attracted by Lord Palmerston or Lord J. Russell; he felt it would be base and cowardly of character that he could not support it, believing as he did that the Parliament required for revising the representation of the country.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

VISCOUNTESS KEITH.

THE RIGHT HON. HESTER MARIA, VISCOUNTESS KEITH, the eldest daughter of Dr. Johnson's celebrated friends, Mr. and Mrs. Thrale, died at her town house, 110, Piccadilly, on the 31st ult., in her ninety-third year. Her Ladyship was the second wife of the renowned Admiral George Keith Elphinstone, who for his great naval services was created successively Baron and Viscount Keith, and who died in 1823. Her Ladyship was married to the Admiral in 1808, and had a daughter, Georgiana Augusta Maria, now the widow of the Hon. Augustus Villiers, second son of the present Earl of Jersey. The Viscountess Keith's stepdaughter is the present Baroness Keith, who inherited her father's Barony only, pursuant to special limitation.

LADY SUSAN MARIA HOTHAM.

THE LADY SUSAN MARIA HOTHAM was the eldest daughter of William, second Marquis of Thomond, whose Marquisate is now extinct, and whose Barony of Inchiquin is held by the present Sir Lucius O'Brien, Lord Inchiquin. Lady Susan was born the 10th March, 1804; and was married, the 12th August, 1824, to Rear-Admiral the Hon. George Frederick Hotham, who was brother of the present Lord Hotham, and who died the 19th Oct., 1856. By this marriage her Ladyship had seven children, of whom three only survive her—viz. Charles, a lieutenant in the 18th R. I. Regiment (her presumptive to the Barony of Hotham); John, in the Navy; and Susan Frances. Lady Susan Maria Hotham died at Tunbridge Wells on the 25th ult.

LADY DUFFUS.

THE death of the Right Hon. Janet, Lady Duffus (the result of the accident which befel her Ladyship upwards of a month ago) occurred on the 15th ult. Her Ladyship had just entered her eighty-ninth year. The venerable lady was the eldest daughter of George Mackay, Esq., of Bighouse, Sutherland; and in early life possessed great personal attractions. In 1784 she was married to Sir Benjamin Dunbar, Bart., of Hempriggs, Caithness-shire, who succeeded his cousin as sixth Lord Duffus in 1827, and died in May, 1843; leaving issue by her Ladyship two sons, the elder of whom is the seventh and present Lord Duffus, and one daughter, now Mrs. Gordon Duff, of Hilton.

SIR J. K. SHAW, BART.

SIR JOHN KENWARD SHAW, sixth Baronet, of Eltham, Kent, was the eldest son of Sir John Gregory Shaw, the fifth Baronet, by his wife, Theodosia Margaret, daughter of John second Lord Mostyn. He was born the 10th March, 1783, and succeeded his father as sixth Baronet the 28th October, 1831. He married, in 1809, Charlotte, second daughter of William Lloyd, Esq., of Batchworth, Surrey, but has had no issue. The worthy Baronet, who was a Deputy Lieutenant of Kent, and, from 1812 to 1815, Colonel of the West Kent Militia, died at Paris on the 17th ult. He is succeeded by his nephew, John Charles Kenward Shaw, now the seventh Baronet, the only son of the late Captain Charles Shaw, R.N., by his wife, Frances Anne, fourth daughter of Sir Henry Hawley, Bart.

This Baronetcy of Shaw is a very old one. The first Baronet was John Shaw, a citizen of London, and a stanch Cavalier, who rendered essential service to Charles II., by advancing him money during his exile, and who, in reward, was, after the Restoration, a Farmer of the Customs, and was created a Baronet the 14th of April, 1665.

SIR JOSHUA RICKETTS ROWLEY, BART.

SIR JOSHUA RICKETTS ROWLEY, third Baronet, of Tendring Hall, county Suffolk, Vice-Admiral of the Blue, was the representative of a family distinguished in our naval annals. He was the great-grandson of the famous Admiral Sir William Rowley, K.B., the grandson of Sir Joshua Rowley, also an eminent Admiral, who was created a Baronet in 1786; the nephew of Admiral Sir Charles Rowley, G.C.B. (who obtained another Baronetcy for his gallant services); and the eldest surviving son of Sir William Rowley, the second Baronet, by his wife Susannah Edith, daughter of Admiral Sir Robert Harland, Bart. He entered early in life the Royal Navy, where he passed through an active and honourable career. He became Rear-Admiral of the Red in 1853, and Vice-Admiral of the Blue in 1855. He succeeded his father in his Baronetcy the 26th October, 1832. He was Sheriff of Suffolk in 1841, and was appointed a Deputy Lieutenant of that county in 1844. He married, the 15th August, 1838, Charlotte, only daughter of John Moseley, Esq., of Great Glenham House, Suffolk, but has had no issue. The gallant Vice-Admiral died at his town residence, 61, Wimpole-street, on the 18th ult. He is succeeded by his next brother, Robert Charles Rowley, a Captain, R.N., now the fourth Baronet, who married, in 1830, Maria Louisa, only daughter of Joshua, second Lord Huntingfield and has issue

WILLIAM WINGFIELD YATES, ESQ.

WILLIAM WINGFIELD YATES, Esq., of Holne-Cot, Devon, formerly of Parkfields, Staffordshire, who died on the 28th of January last, was the grandson of William Yates, Esq., of Springside, Bury, Lancashire, and the elder son of the Rev. William Wildman Yates, Vicar of St. Mary's, Reading, being the other son) of John Yates, Esq., of Barlaston Hall, Staffordshire, by his wife, Harriott, daughter and coheiress of Wingfield Wildman, Esq., grandson and heir of John Wingfield Lee, of Norton and Hazle Barrow, Derbyshire. Mr. William Wingfield Yates was born on the 27th of January, 1792, was educated at the Royal Military College at Marlow, and at the age of sixteen, entered the British Army as an Ensign in the 47th Regiment. He was with that regiment throughout the Peninsular War; and was present, among other engagements, at the Battles of Barossa and Vittoria, for which he obtained a medal with clasps. He was, during the retreat from Burgos, employed to bring up Sir Lowry Cole's division to join Lord Hill's army, which important service he performed by riding two hundred miles across a most difficult country. He was severely wounded in a foraging party on the banks of the Douro, and at the Battle of Vittoria he was so dangerously wounded in both his legs as to be compelled to leave the Army. He married, in 1817, Cecilia, third daughter of John Peel, Esq., of the Pastures House, Derbyshire, by whom he had issue five daughters and eight sons. His eldest son is Lieutenant-Colonel Edmund Robert William Wingfield Yates, late of the Second Regiment, for many years Military Secretary to General Sir William Gomm, in Jamaica, the Mauritius, and the East Indies. Others of Mr. Yates's sons have served with distinction in the British and the Austrian armies.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The County Elections have this last week been occupying public attention, and Ministerial triumph has been the rule throughout. This was expected, and, indeed, the Conservatives hastened to find an anticipating excuse for it, alleging that at the accession of Lord Derby to office, and while he was amusing the agricultural mind, positively for the last time, with the fable of possible Protection, several seats, naturally belonging to the Liberal interest, passed over to the Opposition, and are now reclaimed. A bridge of gold for a flying enemy, and the Liberals may accept a solution which will by no means bear being examined. Middlesex refuses Lord Chelsea, and elects Mr. Hanbury in the place of Mr. Bernal Osborne. West Kent throws out the Conservative, Mr. Masters Smith, and returns two Liberals. A Conservative is thrown out for East Sussex. And similar results elsewhere already enable the Ministerialists to claim a very large net gain in the counties. The Conservatives allege that in the boroughs they have lost four seats only; while the Peelites and Manchester men are completely extinguished, and they congratulate the country upon the absorption of outlying factions and the resumption of the legitimate constitutional division of the House into two great parties.

Another mitre having been placed at the disposal of Government, Lord Palmerston is stated to have again taken counsel from Lord Shaftesbury, and to have selected for the See of Norwich another Evangelical aristocrat, the Honourable and Reverend Mr. Pelham, brother to the Earl of Chichester. Mr. Pelham was born in 1811. The High Church party may have reason to complain that their men are so constantly passed over; but there is a very fair House of Commons' answer for them—namely, that the Tractarian view of Church relations with the State by no means favours the right of a Minister to elect the hierarchy at all. It would seem logical, therefore, in Lord Palmerston to give lawn to those who would disfranchise him. The allegation that the Evangelicals, with all their zeal and activity, are the least-educated part of the clergy, and find it easier to read Matthew Henry and Scott than Athanasius and Chrysostom, is a charge which may have its weight, but which, in times when we want missionaries as much as scholars in our pupils, may not be so damaging as those who raise it are inclined to believe. But the See of Norwich will not be actually vacant for several weeks or months. In the mean time it is premature to speculate on Mr. Pelham's appointment.

The ludicrous demonstrations of the Belgian Protectionists against England, on account of her Free-trade and desire to see that system adopted on the Continent are rather subjects for the Charivari and Punch than for grave comment. The people who confront a question of political economy with a large-stomached figure of John Bull, devouring all he can get, and then throw the figure into the water amid yells and execrations, have too much in common with the negro adorers of Mumbo-Jumbo to be dealt with seriously. But we observe that the Foreign Minister of Belgium has spoken in terms of indignant contempt upon the subject, and has remarked to the Protectionists that, though the English will, no doubt, laugh at them, it is not to the credit of Belgium that the attitude of England towards her should be one of derision. There is no fear, however, lest our countrymen should for a moment confound a few greedy and prejudiced men, leading an ignorant mob, with the people of Belgium, whose character, intellect, and spirit we have long learned to hold in high respect. Belgium might as reasonably take the Kidderminster ruffians as specimens of English electors.

England and Austria have withdrawn from Turkish sea and land, and Russia has abandoned Ismail and the Danube. And so the last evidences of war may be said to be entirely obliterated. The one subject to which English capital and enterprise should now be directed is the turning to account the grand highway now proposed to be thrown fairly open through the heart of countries whose resources have never yet been appreciated, far less developed. The addition to our duty may be triumphantly avenged on the Danube, with incalculable benefit to Russia, Austria, and Turkey.

The inequality of punishment in England will be an incessant theme for comment until codification shall bring our criminal law into a form in which a synoptical view of the system will enable such absurdity to be corrected. Meantime, the more instances that can be collected the better case for the law reformers. We are not about to refer to a sentence which gave a lad, for throwing a stone at a railway, three months' solitary confinement. The offence might have had grave consequences; and, had a passenger lost an eye, he would scarcely have petitioned for an abbreviation of the imprisonment. The boy, too, may be a hardened young rascal, and the magistrate is probably cognisant of details with which the public is unacquainted. Our present complaint takes a different direction. A card-sharper on a railway seems likely to get twelve months' imprisonment and a whipping for trying to cheat somebody else, who, of course, only played in the hope of getting the better of him; and we have nothing to say against the extirpation of such vermin except that it is a pity that betting-office keepers and the like are not similarly treated. But, if a boy who throws a stone has three months, and a cheat who wins a penny has twelve, why is a miscreant who skins cats alive to escape with a lighter punishment than either? Neither the woman nor the man who were convicted of this atrocity were sent to solitary confinement: and the latter, who should have been whipped at both ends of the sentence with an interpolated whipping in order to mark the middle of it, has but three months. The only satisfactory point about this last case was the way the scoundrel was hunted to conviction by the boys, and we were glad to see that the magistrate received rewards for them from readers of the journals. If it were made clear to our gamins that they would be paid for detecting such offenders, the shrewdness and energy of the London boy would soon be turned to excellent account.

Another Paul Veronese for the National Gallery.—A letter from Venice in the Courrier Franco-Italien, says that the picture of Paul Veronese, called "The Tent of Darius," which he painted for a gift to the Pisani family in return for the hospitality he had received at their house, has just been purchased of the present representatives of that family for the sum of £14,000 sterling, to be placed in "the British Museum at London," by which, of course, must be meant the National Gallery. The price is probably exaggerated.

How Tutors are Paid.—A short time since there appeared an advertisement requiring a tutor for a family in Yorkshire, to attend to eight or nine boys. This was answered, says a correspondent, by a friend of mine (who obtained high honours in his University, offering to teach classics, mathematics, modern languages, and the usual course of a gentleman's education. You may judge of my surprise when I saw the answer my friend received, which was as follows:—"Dear Sir,—In answer to yours of the 30th of March, respecting your application for the tutorship advertised in the Times, I would be treated as one of my own family in every respect with the exception of the washing. You would decidedly have the entire control over your pupils. As I consider the duties of both England, and the stipend which I offer is liberal, to which my friend very properly answered as follows:—"Sir, I accept his compliments to Mr. ——, and begs to say that he cannot help thinking the stipend offered is intended as a joke, believing it impossible that any gentleman would willingly offer so great an insult to another as would recommend Mr. —— to avail himself of the services of our farm-labourers, as that would in all probability if not too [illegible] purpose [illegible] in view.

MUSIC.

Passion Week is attended with almost a total suspension of public amusements. All the theatres put a stop to the entertainments which properly belong to them; and the few musical performances of the week are generally of a grave character, becoming the sanctity of the season. The principal concerts of the present week accordingly have been of sacred music. The "Messiah" was given by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, on Wednesday; and by Mr. Hullah, at St. Martin's Hall, on Thursday; and the "Concert for the People," at the same place on Monday evening, was likewise composed of sacred music.

Of the two performances of the "Messiah" it is sufficient to say that, in regard to the scale in which they were got up, the principal performers who took part in them, and the great audiences by whom they were attended, they were precisely like what they have often been before on similar occasions. But the "Concert for the People" is entitled to a few words of remark. This series of concerts, as our musical readers will remember, was set on foot some six or eight months since, for the benevolent purpose of furnishing to the industrious classes a refined and wholesome entertainment, at so moderate a cost as to be within the reach of almost all, save the very poorest. From the beginning the plan obtained the patronage and support of many persons eminent in station, literature, and art; and, though doubts were entertained of its practicability, yet these doubts have been removed by the result. The concerts have been regularly and steadily carried on, and are found to be self-supporting: the receipts derived from the large assemblages who frequent them being sufficient, notwithstanding the low rates of admission, to defray the expense attending them: though that expense must be considerable, as artists of considerable eminence are employed and paid their regular terms a fact which we ascertained by personal inquiry. The concert of Monday evening last was a grave and elevated entertainment, and the gratifying attention paid to severe and lofty music by a vast audience was a proof that taste and feeling for the highest beauties of art are not confined to wealth or station. Among the performers were Miss Birch, Madame Bassano, and other eminent singers. There was a small choir of tunable voices, and the vocal pieces were well accompanied on the organ. The selection consisted of airs and choruses from the oratorios of Handel, Haydn, and Mendelssohn: all performed in a manner calculated to gratify the taste of any one not spoiled by the indulgence of affected fastidiousness. The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, with the Sheriffs and Under Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, honoured the concert with their presence, and many families and individuals well known in the musical world were among the audience.

A series of excellent orchestral concerts has been given during the week in Drury-lane Theatre by Mr. Alfred Mellon. The orchestra has been the excellent band formed by himself, and well known by the name of the Orchestral Union, with the addition of some of the principal performers of Jullien's band. The concerts have consisted of the finest orchestral works—symphonies and overtures—of the great masters, with a pleasant admixture of vocal music, in which our most favourite singers have been employed. The audiences, when we were present, have been large; and we trust that these elegant concerts have had the success they deserved.

St John's School-room, Brixton.—A selection of sacred music was given here on Tuesday evening last, to a tolerably well-filled room, which, unfortunately, did not pass off very satisfactorily—partly in consequence of the gentlemen forming the orchestra of the Brixton Harmonic Union having withdrawn their assistance. The first part of the evening was given to airs, choruses, &c., taken from the "Messiah," which wanted that vigour in the orchestra and choruses that always, when well performed, impresses its hearers with solemn grandeur. The second part was selections from our best composers, such as Rossini, Spohr, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Costa, &c., things that were far beyond their reach; such as the recitations and prayers from "Eli" and the like from Rossini and others. As an illustration we might point to that most beautiful air, "Cujus Animam," from the "Stabat Mater" of Rossini, having been badly played on a cornet-à-piston, instead of being sung. It should be added that the professional instrumentalists (who were engaged at the last moment) did all in their power to keep the orchestra and choruses together, but they were far beyond their control.

A musical publication of a novel and attractive character has just appeared in Paris, entitled "The Musical Souvenir of Beauty for Paris, 1856-57," edited by Abelinde S. G. Rae. The work which has been issued under the immediate patronage of her Majesty the Empress, is on the plan of the English "Book of Beauty," the portraits being those of the most celebrated beauties of different nations, now in Paris, with an accompaniment of appropriate music to each. Among the portraits are those of Mdme. de Girardin, Miss Sneyd, the Comtesse de Castiglione, the Comtesse Walsden, and Mrs. Bristed, representing France, England, Russia, Sardinia, and America. The music possesses considerable beauty and freshness.

THE THEATRES, &c.

Her Majesty's.—The season commences on Tuesday evening. We find that Piccolomini, whom report had described as still pursuing her indefatigable career upon the stage, has been more prudently preparing for the London season by an interval of relaxation, which she has well earned by a series of nineteen representations of the "Traviata," at the Italiens, in Paris. One cannot long be ignorant of her whereabouts, for even her retirement to the home of her friends at Sienna was regarded as a festal occasion, and signalised by joyful demonstrations, the rumours of which have reached us before the prima donna herself. Her arrival, however, may be looked for within a week, as she is known to have left Sienna several days ago. The selection of the opera for her first appearance is, we believe, left undecided until her arrival. "La Figlia," "La Traviata," "Lucia," and the sparkling part of Zerlina in "Don Giovanni," have each been suggested as the most appropriate. But, whatever may be the character, the pet of the opera is sure of an enthusiastic welcome.

Spezzia, Guiglini, Neocilini, and, indeed, all the members of the company whose services will be required for the commencement of the season have been for some time in London; and the opera of "La Favorita" and the "Esmeralda" ballet are in full rehearsal. Important additions have been made to the strength both of the orchestra and chorus—the latter have been reinforced by the best voices from the Italian Opera at Paris: and the additions to the orchestra, besides those who have been before announced as first violins, include Petit, Piatti violoncellist, Tornari and Ghibelli, the principal contra-bass performers from La Scala; Belloli, the celebrated harpist; Colbrunn (from the Italiens) and Belotti, well-known and first-rate performers on their respective instruments, the flute and clarinet. This is as it should be; and, under the direction of Bonetti, the public may be sure that every addition to the strength of orchestra and chorus will be used to the best advantage.

The distinguished artiste, Maria Spezzia, is at present chiefly known to the English public by the rumours of the furore which her beauty and her talent have created at Milan. After a triumphant season at the Imperial Theatre of La Carobbiaro her services were secured for the stage of La Scala during the visit of the Emperor and Empress. In conjunction with the great tenor Gardini, with whom she will make her début among us on the opening night of the season at Her Majesty's Theatre, this charming prima donna achieved a brilliant success in the "Huguenots" and the "Favorita," and, but for her engagement for the London opera, would have continued to reign in acknowledged pre-eminence at the magnificent establishment of La Scala. But this was not an isolated triumph. Notwithstanding her youth, she has already established her fame with almost unprecedented rapidity at Vienna, Turin, Venice, St. Petersburg, Moscow, and Lisbon. The versatility of her genius is shown by the characters which she has triumphantly sustained. Lucia and Norma, Lelinda and Rosina, and Leonora in the opera of "Lombardi" and of Verdi's "Macbeth," and "Trovatore," and the charming "Traviata" are included in her répertoire, and in every condition as was instance the genius of the young and handsome prima donna has been rewarded by the most enthusiastic reception. The part of Traviata, which, in the hands of Piccolomini and Spezzia, is exercised to great a fascination, was, on its first representation, a complete failure. Verdi was in despair until Maria Spezzia came to the rescue, and, by her skilful and poetical rendering of the principal character, secured the success of the opera, which was repeated for twenty consecutive performances, and received with unflagging enthusiasm.

La Spezzia furnishes another example of the overpowering influence of musical art upon Italian natures. Born of a noble family at Vienna, her passion for the stage manifested itself at an early age with so much intensity that her relations found it impossible to resist her aspirations, and wisely allowed her to pursue the bent of her genius under the guidance of the most celebrated masters, whose instructions have given to her that perfect mastery of her art without which even youth, beauty, and talent often fail to produce a permanent impression.

Easter Amusements, &c.—Mr. C. H. Adams has, as usual, presented his Orrery at the Haymarket during the week, accompanied with his annual lecture on astronomy; and Mr. Henry Russell, his entertainment at the Princess'. At the National Standard Mr. Love also has appeared in "All Shapes," assisted by Herr Zeroom and the seven Spanish Minstrels. At the City of London a new experiment has been tried, in order to evade the law which, during Passion Week, deprives regular actors of a week's salary by prohibiting dramatic performances. Instead of extra professors being engaged, the regular company has been employed in exhibiting a monster entertainment, consisting of the action of two pantomimes, concert singing, athletic exercises, exhibitions of the pas gymnastique, and other similar theatrical, though not "dramatic," inventions. A law which can be so easily evaded, and is so manifestly absurd and unjust in itself, should be regarded as obsolete. Tom Thumb has been starring at the Surrey Theatre; and Herr Wohlgemuth, the German Wizard, at Sadler's Wells. The Brothers Alfred and Henry Holmes have revealed the wonders of the violin to admiring audiences at the Polytechnic; while Dr. Bachhoffner has delivered at the Colosseum a daily lecture on astronomy, illustrated by a new and beautiful orrery: Mr Gordon Cumming continued his lion-hunting narratives at his Saloon in Piccadilly; Mr. W. S. Woodin, at the Polygraphic Hall, repeated nightly his customary entertainment, the "Olio of Oddities;" and Mr Albert Smith ascended Mont Blanc at the Egyptian Hall. Mr. Creswick, too, reads "Hamlet" and "Lear" at St. Martin's Hall; while at the Strand Theatre dissolving views have been exhibited, in connection with a comic ballet, entitled "Mad as a March Hare." Mr. and Mrs T. German Reed announce their intention to give the last performances of their Popular Illustrations during Easter-week. Mr. Henry Seymour Carleton announces an original entertainment at St. Martin's Hall for Easter Monday, to be called "Familiar Faces; or, Old Friends in New Places." A new classical love-story, on the subject of "Atalanta; or, The Three Golden Apples," is also advertised for Easter Monday at the Haymarket, when also will commence a new arrangement of prices: the pit being reduced to two shillings, and the galleries to a shilling, and sixpence. We trust that this modification of the tariff will improve the prospects of the management. At the Adelphi the drama of "Lake and Lubke" will be revived, in which, and "The Statue Bride," Madame Celeste will reappear for the holidays. At the Princess' "King Richard II." will be found a sufficient attraction; and no wonder, considering the taste, talent, and judgment displayed in its production. At Sadler's Wells, Mr. George A. Webster takes the management, as heretofore, at this season, and announces the engagement of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Dillon, in the dramas of "Pizarro" and "The King's Musketeers;" and these are to be followed by other stars during his conduct of the theatre. At the Lyceum Mdme. Ristori is announced for fifteen performances, to commence the first week in June. Mr. Dillon's season closed on Thursday week, on which occasion he sustained the part of Richelieu, and made an address to the audience, wherein he stated that his management had been decidedly prosperous, and had indeed yielded a profit which would enable him to recommence in August next with increased prospects of success. Cremorne Gardens are to open on Sunday for refreshment and promenade, and on Monday for amusement during the Easter season. Extensive alterations and improvements are in progress, and will be completed by the commencement of the summer season.

Mr. Ottley on the Prerogative of the Crown.—A lecture in connection with the "Free-trade and Foreign Affairs Association" has been given at the office of the Association, Manchester, by Mr. H. Ottley, on the 2nd instant—subject, "The Prerogative of the Crown in connection with the Diplomatic Department, the Signing of Treaties, and the Levying of War." The chairman (Mr John Buxton) having introduced Mr. Ottley to the meeting, he commenced by alluding to the importance of the subject of our foreign relations, which he considered was not a little, if not before, [illegible] The diplomacy of Courts was of comparatively modern origin; it was not so old as gunpowder, and perhaps owed its origin to the invention of that destructive agent. The ostensible object of diplomacy was to preserve amicable relations between States: would seem to claim for it the character of being the antidote of war; but, looking at the history of the last three centuries, there were reasons for strong misgivings as to whether anything had occasioned more misery and wrong to suffering humanity. The pen had signed away more lives and liberties than the sword had destroyed, and that insidiously. It was then diplomacy became a science and a state engine, when Kings retained Ambassadors in the courts of their neighbours as spies and mischief-makers, that the authority of the people began to subside and to be substituted by the will of the Sovereign. The Treaty of Westphalia, which gave authority to every petty Prince of Germany to make peace or war without reference to the Diet, might be regarded as a chief cause of the great increase of the prerogative of the Crown. The present reigning family of England had come from that quarter, and hence, perhaps, the disposition they had evinced to assert their prerogative. He then alluded to the secrecy of diplomacy, which prevented the nation knowing who served them faithfully, and, in case of failure, who was wrong. He considered that measures to be publicly, not only as regarded the instructions which public agents received, but as to the progress of their labours. The lecturer concluded by referring to the secret proposals which were made by the late Czar to Sir Hamilton Seymour, and to the convention between Great Britain and France respecting the Turkish loan, which was concluded before Parliament was consulted, as illustrations of the evils of secret diplomacy; remarking, respecting the former, that the concealing of that correspondence made us participes criminis in the intention of the Czar, and the upshot of the matter was that we had to send 80,000 men to the Crimea, and £80 000,000 after them to bury them. The proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the lecturer.

MR. SHERIFF MECHI.

This intelligent gentleman, who fills with credit to himself and advantage to the public, the high office of senior Sheriff of London and Middlesex, has hitherto been chiefly known for his successful experiments in agricultural chemistry at his model farm, at Tiptree Heath, between Kelvedon and Maldon, in Essex. His name was also recently brought forward as a candidate for Maldon, but without success, although he polled largely in the neighbourhood promised him success; and Mr. Mechi's exertions during the recent election were restricted to his duties as one of the returning officers for the city of London and the county of Middlesex; and in both contests his arrangements for the accommodation of the public have received marked commendation.

Of the antecedents of Mr. Mechi the Recorder gave the following interesting resumé in presenting the new Sheriffs to the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, in September last.

In the person of Mr. John Joseph Mechi, senior Sheriff, an Italian and Lombard, and who was connected with the eastern division of the metropolis, they had a gentleman of Italian extraction, but a man who was proud to be numbered among the merchants of the city of London. Although he had sprung from the Italian race, who were remarkable for their cultivation of the arts and sciences, he was proud, he repeated, to be enrolled among the merchants and men of business of this country. His father was born in Rome, but early in life he transferred the scene of his pursuits, and was for a long time employed in business in France; but, during the Reign of Terror, he, in common with many others, quitted it, and took refuge in this country. Here he subsequently attracted the attention of the Royal family, and was soon afterwards taken into the Royal household. He was, by early parsons; in consequence of his great proficiency in the Italian language, was received into a house in the City; and his studies might offer an example to the young men of the present day, and prove to them the advantage of becoming early acquainted with the modern languages. He pursued his business for twenty-two years, when he was selected to preside over a large banking corporation, and he now stood on the footing of one of the first citizens of London. Besides his occupation in business, he devoted himself to the improvement of agriculture, on a limited estate, where he gave a hospitable invited men of talent and skill to witness the combined results of capital and science.

The Tiptree gatherings to which the Recorder here alludes have been year by year chronicled in our pages; and the Sheriff recently told the public that the farm originated in his success in business inducing him to invest money in attempting to improve the soil upon which he was born. He added, that fifteen years ago he considered the agriculture of the country to be unworthy of our national standing, and it was still the same. He could travel from John o' Groat's House to the Land's End and find tens of thousands of farms in as bad a condition as was once his own farm at Tiptree, the improvement of which had proved a good investment.

PLATE PRESENTED BY THE INHABITANTS OF CALCUTTA TO SIR ROWLAND MACDONALD STEPHENSON, MANAGING DIRECTOR OF THE EAST INDIAN RAILWAY.

THIS superb piece of table plate has just been presented by the inhabitants of Calcutta to Sir Rowland Macdonald Stephenson, the Managing Director of the East Indian Railway. The presentation took place just previous to this gentleman's return to England from Calcutta, and was accompanied by an address, acknowledging the obligations of the inhabitants for the very important services rendered to British India, but more especially to its metropolis

"From the year 1840," says the address, "you have worked with an untiring energy to obtain for this country the blessing of railway communication, and we, your friends, greatly rejoice that you have been enabled to see part of your well-considered and admirable project so successfully carried out. Without perseverance such as yours we should to the present day have been without a single mile of railway on this side of India. Led by your excellent example, the other Presidencies of India have taken up the scheme which you years ago predicted would be of such advantage to this country; and you have proved, contrary to the almost universal anticipation of the Indian public, that this mode of communication is not less adapted to the wants and habits of the natives of India than to those of the inhabitants of Europe."

The names attached to this document are—the Marquis of Dalhousie (the late Governor-General of India), the Deputy-Governor of Bengal, the Chief Justice, the Judges of the Supreme Court, the President of the Council, the members of the Council, the Sudder Court Judges, the Commander-in-Chief, the Government Secretaries, the principal members of the bar, all the mercantile houses, and a considerable number of private individuals, European and native.

The Plate consists of a magnificent candelabrum, valued at £250; and which, at the same time, is fitted for an épergne. The candelabrum (as may be seen from our Engraving) is fitted for three lights, and consists of a shaft of Indian shape and ornament, placed upon a triangular base, and bearing aloft the branches for the light. The form is extremely simple, the richness of effect being given by the ornament and the material. At each angle of the base are Indian figures: a Hindoo porter and girl with vase, agriculturists with their implements, and an English engineer directing a native workman in his operations. The figures have been modelled after nature, and are of frosted silver. At the immediate base of the shaft is a space containing the cipher of Sir Rowland Stephenson; and on the base itself are two basso-relievi of Indian scenery; whilst the third entablature contains the dedicatory inscription.

This beautiful group has been designed and executed by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell, New Bond-street.

NEW TOWNHALL, BLACKBURN.

AMONGST the many busy manufacturing towns of Lancashire which are making great efforts to improve their architectural appearance perhaps none are more remarkable than Blackburn. The corporation are widening, levelling, and draining the streets; handsome piles of shops and warehouses are springing up on every side; a large public park has been nearly completed; a handsome market house and town-hall built; and baths and washhouses, and a first-class infirmary, are now proposed to be erected. The Townhall, of which we give a view, has been erected from the design of Mr. Patterson, a clever architect of Blackburn.

The style is Italian. The west, or entrance, front is 120 feet long and 62 feet high to the top of parapet. The outline is varied by the groups of chimneys which rise to the height of 71 feet. The other fronts are of a plainer character—that towards the market-place having a Doric portico over the magistrates' entrance-door. The police office and prison are at the east end of the buildings, the entrance to the prison-yard being under a rusticated gateway. On the ground-floor the vestibule is 49 feet 6 inches by 36 feet.

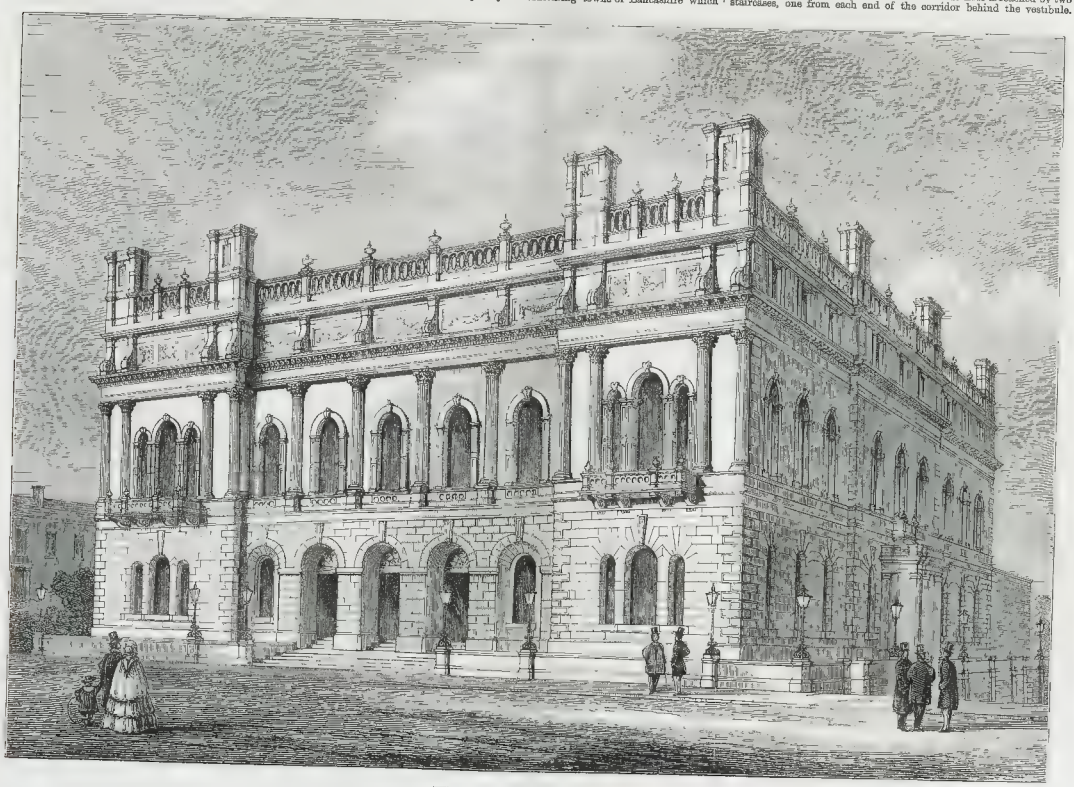
On the right is a news-room 51 feet by 37 feet; on the left, and occupying a corresponding space, are the council-room, 51 feet by 24 feet, and Town Clerk's office and muniment-room. Behind the vestibule, and separated from it by a corridor 9 feet wide, is the police court, 54 feet by 35 feet, and 26 feet high, lighted by a glass dome 12 feet in diameter. On one side of this court is the Mayor's parlour, 25 feet by 18 feet; a smaller police court, 36 feet by 24 feet, clerks' office, attorneys', and other rooms; and on the other side is the public entrance to the large court, and rooms for the clerks connected with the business of the court. On the east side are the police office and the prison, containing eighteen cells. The first floor is reached by two staircases, one from each end of the corridor behind the vestibule.



THE NEW TOWNHALL, BLACKBURN.

One of these staircases is 23 feet by 12 feet, and gives access to the first floor, and also to the various floors on the north side of the building. The other, or principal, staircase is 24 feet square, the steps being 7 feet clear length, and the balustrade of stone, and leading to the large room and rooms connected with it on the first floor. The walls of this staircase are finished with scagliola pilasters. The west front is wholly occupied by a large room or hall for public meetings, 114 feet long by 50 feet wide, and 34 feet high, giving an area of more than 600 square yards; thus affording sitting room for more than 1200 persons, or standing room for 3600 persons. There are other rooms on this floor connected with the large hall. Two of them are 44 feet 9 inches by 24 feet 6 inches, and 25 feet by 18 feet respectively, and are each 19 feet high. In the second and third floors are the borough surveyor's and the keeper's house, &c. On the north side there is a house for the superintendent of police. In the basement are the offices of the collectors and inspector of nuisances, rooms for the police, cellars for the warming apparatus, &c. There are also two towers containing ventilating shafts, each 80 feet high. To secure the confidence of large assemblies, the stairs are all made of stone; there are four large outlets from the large assembly-room, and the corridors, passages, &c., are fireproof.

"OVER THE BROOK."

PAINTED BY G. CHESTER.

We engrave this very pleasing and natural picture by Mr. Chester. The lines by Mr. Mark Lemon, which accompany the title of the painting in the Catalogue are so appropriate and suggestive that we cannot do better than quote them :—

Over the brook, Mary; over the brook!
There are no other eyes near but mine to look.
Thy autumn's brown burthen I'll carry for thee.
And a smile and a word shall be payment to me.

We scarcely know why, but the incident of crossing a brook is an extremely favourite subject with both poets and artists. Innumerable are the pictures and passages of poetry in which this little rustic adventure is depicted or described. It is true the trepidations - interesting if real, and pretty if merely pretended—of the fair passenger lend an interest to the moment, and often afford a welcome opportunity, as Mr. Mark Lemon has represented, for a display of gallantry. But does not the chief attraction, to the eye of the painter and the poet, consist in this—that, as in our picture, a glimpse is afforded of many a clean-turned ankle and feet not flattened by excessive dancing, nor distorted by fashionable, almost Chinese compression — feet beautiful as those of a Greek statue, simply because the wise intentions of nature are not set aside? The buxom lassie in our picture is certainly in all respects an excellent specimen of country comeliness, and rustic health and strength.

The composition of the picture is very successful, because apparently quite unstudied; and the whole work is extremely pleasing and agreeable. The foliage is admirable. It is multitudinous and intricate, full of variegated chequered light and shade, and endlessly diversified depths and gradations. Very pleasant would it be in sultry noontide, or serene summer evening, to lie on that mossy bank beneath the shade of those thick-tangled branches, and listen to the trickle of the brook, the fairy rustlings among those countless leaves, or the "sweet song of birds," with nothing to disturb our fancies but bonny "Mary," whose "burthen" we should certainly insist upon carrying over.

M. DUMAS ON ENGLAND

The Assemblée Nationale is amusingly severe on the historian of the British elections, M. Dumas, the elder—and not the younger, as stated by some of the London journals. It says:—"The importance of the English elections had led the Presse to dispatch to the other side of the Channel a political man extraordinary, with instructions to examine, appreciate, and understand everything that takes place, and to reveal the same to the fortunate readers of that journal. The incomparable statesman selected for this high mission is the author of 'Ange Pitou' and of the 'Mousquetaires' and of the 'Memoirs of Alexandre Dumas,' who speaks on all subjects with that inexhaustible fecundity that has already filled some thousand volumes, and which threatens us with another thousand. M. Dumas composes his political letters from materials supplied by the old almanacks of London. He will avail himself of this source for many a day to come."

"THE EMPEROR" YACHT FOR PRESENTATION BY THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT TO THE EMPEROR OF JAPAN.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

THE STEAM-YACHT "EMPEROR."

THIS beautiful craft has been built and fitted in the Thames, as a present from the Government of this country to his Majesty the Emperor of Japan; and a sum of £19,000 was voted in the Navy Estimates for that purpose. The Emperor is a wooden vessel of three hundred tons burden, built by the Messrs. Green, of Blackwall, from designs by Mr. Crewe, of that establishment. She is an elegant model of beautiful lines, magnificently fitted out by Messrs. Smart, of Finsbury; and propelled by engines of 60 horse power, made by the Messrs. Penn, of Greenwich. Her speed is satisfactory, and the completeness of everything connected with this most gratifying compliment to the foreign potentate reflects the greatest credit on all concerned in her construction and outfit.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE past week has been a complete racing blank, but the betting on the Two Thousand has proved of the most dashing kind, and no less than nine horses are backed already. Vedette has been heavily peppered, but 4½ to 1 were the last quotations, and Kent, who has changed his quarters with the rest of Lord Londesborough's from Hambleton to Newmarket for the Spring Meetings, has come to 10 to 1. Blink Bonny, who was honoured by a visit from a Baron of the Exchequer during the York Assizes, is at 7 to 1 for the Derby, and 4 to 1 for the Oaks. Lady Hawthorne being second to her on each, but quoted at 15 to 1 and 6 to 1 respectively. St. Giles and Dulcamara both came to grief at Epsom, in fields which were sadly small in comparison with the brave days of Beeton. Adamus, whose prospective merits we have been perpetually pointing out to our readers for these six months past, and to whom we adhered stoutly for Epsom after our Northampton disappointment, all but repeated the Virago feat; beating Wardersmarke a plain but clever-going half brother to Islington for the Suburban by a neck, and only succumbing, an hour after, by a head to old Poodle for the Metropolitan. This low and lengthy son of Touchstone was actually receiving only 20 lb. from a horse four years his senior, over two miles and a half; so that, if Saunterer is fully 7 lb. better than him this season, as he showed himself to be last autumn at Chester, the two mares will have their own troubles at Epsom. Saunterer is said to be the property of Mr. Jackson, who seems to be most anxious to get on his other horse, "Magnifier" (though this may be a mere ruse to get off his money), as he frequently takes a point or two less about other animals in the market, provided they will throw him the chestnut in. A more racing-like horse than the latter did not show last year. Quinton, we are glad to find, entirely denies the truth of the charges made against him; and Mr. Robinson indorses his statement that no "confession" of any kind has been made, as the Life asserted. He is such a clever 7 st. jockey that we sincerely trust the whole may prove a canard. Bartholomew has been riding gallops for Scott, and has been "wasting" hard for his Newmarket mounts. Mrs. Beeton has received an intimation from the magistrates that her subscription betting-room must be closed; and it is worthy of note that a betting office exists in London at present fitted up in every respect like an undertaker's shop.

Foinualla has just thrown a brown colt, brother to Mincepie; and, according to the latest calculations, the average of blood foals registered in 1853-56 was 12.7.

The steeplechases for next week are East Suffolk, on Monday, Coventry, on Tuesday; Llanvrdy, on Wednesday and Thursday; Hexham and Nuneston, on Thursday; Abergavenny, on Thursday and Friday; and Gullane (N.B.), on Saturday; while Ireland has its Meath Hunt on Thursday, and its Kildare Hunt on Thursday and Friday. Racing opens in earnest on Monday, and goes on for five days at Newmarket; Durham has its tryst on Monday and Tuesday, and on Wednesday and Thursday Mr. "Judge Johnson" hears causes in the Catterick winning-post field. Coventry has also its say on Monday, and Abergavenny on Thursday; and "the gentlemen" take an after-noon to themselves on Saturday, at the Hoo. Two matches only are down for Newmarket; but the names of Glenmasson, in the Sale Stakes, Mountain Sheep, the 50 sov. ditto; Colonist and Ayacanora, in the Column Handicap and Kent, in the 100 sovs., and M. D. and Gem and Derry in the 50 sovs. A.F., all lend a little excitement to a somewhat dull list. The Two-year-old Stakes at Catterick are well filled and there is every prospect of a good meeting. Ignoramus is in the last-mentioned stake at Newmarket, but we do not expect to see him out so early in the season.

Mr. Wilfred Lawson, who hunts the Cumberland Hounds without any subscription, and has shown most capital sport, had an accident with them on Saturday. His horse put its foot into a drain, and flung him with his head against a stone, and he was carried out of the field insensible to his father's, at Brayton Hall. A severe concussion of the brain was dreaded, but we hear that he is progressing rapidly towards recovery. Mr. A. Thompson's huntsman, Tom Powell, is, we hear, engaged to Lord Henry Bentinck, vice John Jones; and, if any change occurs in Lord Stamford's management, it seems hardly likely that his rare first whip, Sam Bacon, will be passed over for promotion. Lord Southampton, it is also said, will not hunt his hounds himself next season, but is on the look out for a field-huntsman; and we do not hear that Lord Macclesfield, who has taken the South Oxfordshire, which Mr. J. S. Phillips has just resigned from ill health, after nine very successful seasons, is suited with men as yet. "The Cheshire difficulty" seems likely to linger on unsettled for another season. The present master informs the M. F. H. Committee that he "shall not feel himself bound by any decision they may arrive at [illegible] in his letters. he would rather trot the hounds along the road on hunting days" than give in before the 1st of April, 1858, when his three years term expires. A few woodlands will be routed during the next fortnight, and then the hares will be put in rest once more. Mr. A. Thompson's hounds were sold on Saturday, and 54½ couple of entered Lonsdale produced 628 guineas, and 25 couple of unentered 203 guineas. They were sold in five-couple lots; the best of which fetched 100 guineas. The blood was principally that of the Yarborough Rallywood and Harper and the Richmond Gaddet. The Sporting Review mentions that the Brocklesby entry of young hounds this year is remarkably fine. For some years past it had decidedly fallen off. The farmers take great delight again in their young charges, as Tom Smith is quite after their own [illegible]

The result of the [illegible] greatly overshadowed by the betting; and it is worthy of note that Mr. Snow, who was in the first bracket of four in the Classical Tripos last month, pulled "8" in the Cambridge boat; so that—as in the case of Croker, Denman and Penrose, cæs ediles—the highest university and boating honours can coexist. Monday is fixed for the Naturals Rowing Club Match, from Putney to Chiswick; and, on the same afternoon, all Newcastle will excite itself by watching T. Candlish row W. Taylor from the High Level Brid[illegible]

A HANDSOME TESTIMONIAL has been presented to J. R. Johnston, Esq., M.R.C.S.E., by his friends of Grand Port Mauritius, as a token of their esteem and regard on his leaving [illegible] years of his professional career amongst them. The gift is a piece of table plate, representing a banana-tree, surmounted by a crystal tazza, surrounded at the base by [illegible] three cups [illegible] the centre, on a pedestal, and bear [illegible] charitable Doctor J. R. Johnston, esq. [illegible] The plate, which is of elegant [illegible] silver, by Messrs. Smith, Nicholson, and [illegible] Lincoln's-in

A FREAK OF FORTUNE.—The Greenock Telegraph states that the distant relatives of a Calcutta merchant recently deceased, who was a native of Renfrewsy, have just come to the knowledge that their ancestor, of whom they scarcely ever heard, left the enormous fortune of £1,000,000 sterling, bequeathed to those of his relations who can be discovered. There is already known number about thirty, and several of them are now resident in Greenock, Dumbarton, and Glasgow.

WIFE POISONING AT CHORLEY.—Edward Hardman, a shoemaker of Chorley, Lancashire, was committed to Lancaster Gaol last week on a charge of wilful murder. Hardman's wife died early in March, and was buried in Brindle parish church; but, as some suspicion existed as to the cause of her death, the body was exhumed on the 20th ult., and the stomach and other viscera were examined by an analytical chemist, who found arsenic and antimony in them. The gentleman who had made the examination expressed his opinion that the woman's death had resulted from po.son.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

LIEUT.-GENERAL THE HON. T. ASHBURNHAM, C.B., appointed to the command of the military force about to be dispatched to the west of war in China, left town on Saturday, accompanied by several military officers, for Alexandria, en route to Hong-Kong, to assume his command.

On Saturday last his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, Lord Panmure, the Persian Ambassador, Feroukh Khan, and a large number of officers, arrived at Woolwich for the purpose of witnessing a series of experiments. The experiments commenced with a trial of the efficiency of shells filled with molten iron, for the purpose of firing any ignitable matter. The shells filled with the destructive fluid were fired against an immense erection of timber-work resembling the bulkhead of a vessel. The second shell pierced completely through the bulkhead, the fluid fire caught the timberwork, and volumes of flame issued forth from the opposite side, proving incontestably that by this means a whole fleet might easily be destroyed. The next experiments were for the purpose of testing the durability of iron plates of the same description as those with which the huge double-tier batteries constructed during the late wars were composed. An iron target, built, or ranged, had been faced with iron plates four inches thick, and, first, a discharge of 68-pounders was fired at this object from a range of 400 yards. The effect was visible, and several of the plates were damaged. The second trial of the same description of shot was tried at a range of 800 yards, and the result was conclusive, as the iron plates were splintered and crushed, and it was evident that repeated attacks would entirely destroy them. The experiments concluded by a trial of Captain Boxer's newly-invented signal parachutes. This description of firework is intended as a means of illumination for the purpose of signalling, and is much used in warfare. It gradually ascends, and at a certain altitude the encasement expands into the form of a parachute, from which issue forth jets of the most brilliant light.

The Hastings, 60, screw block-ship, was commissioned on Wednesday, at Portsmouth, by Captain H. B. Mends, late of the Royal Albert, for coastguard service, with a complement of 350 men. On the same day the Assistance, iron steam troop-ship, got her steam in the timber-work at Portsmouth, to try her engines, before being reported ready for commission. On Wednesday also the Brisk, 14, floating battery, was taken out of the steam-basin at Portsmouth.

The Lebanon arrived at Woolwich on Wednesday morning to embark four companies of artillery and a provision of war stores for Canada and Halifax, in consequence of the small number of hands reserved in the Military Store Departments of Her Majesty's Dockyards to the arrangements provided by the estimates granted for the ensuing year, the work of shipping stores is naturally progressing slowly, but withstanding the most active exertions even on boy and oth.s hands.

ONE of the Australian line of emigrant vessels, the Admiral, was ordered down from Deptford to Woolwich on Wednesday to ship Ordnance stores, and also to embark Captain A. J Clerke, Lieutenant R. D Malcolm, Lieutenant G. D Pritchard, and the 23rd Company of the Royal Engineers, for China. The Admiral has been especially selected for this purpose by reason of her spacious accommodation and healthily arranged decks (7½ feet in height), essentially requisite in the present emergency, when the transports will be retained in the service as local quarters for the troops on arrival at their destination.

CAPTAIN LEOPOLD GRANVILLE PAGET, with the officers and gunners composing the R field battery of instruction, recently formed at Aldershott, arrived on Wednesday night at head-quarters, Woolwich, and joined their battalion, to be prepared for foreign service. The horses were disposed of among the troops and batteries serving under Colonel Warde at Aldershott.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

CONSIDERABLE excitement has been observed in City circles this week in consequence of great stringency in the Money Market. Nearly all Securities have given way in prices, and serious apprehensions are indulged in that we are about to pass through a money crisis. Certainly the proceedings of the Directors of the Bank of England have favoured that impression, as they partake more of the nature of alarm than even a moderate amount of confidence. Last week, it will be remembered, the minimum rate of discount at the Bank was advanced to 6½ per cent. This advance was, no doubt, the result of pressure for money; which, it may be assumed, was even more severe on Monday, as the Directors met twice late on that day that accommodation would be limited to bills having not more than a month to run; and that on bills of longer date they would only make advances for a fortnight. These changes, however, did not apply to the usual mercantile paper, which was taken at 6½ per cent. That the pressure is not yet at its height is evident from the enormous sums which no doubt can exist; yet it is evident that the Directors are desirous of checking the efflux of silver from this country to the East and of preventing the withdrawal of gold from the Bank of England. The new Russian Railway scheme. We are told that "the main cause of the present stringency consists in the disposition of speculators to continue paying the high rates of interest demanded for carrying over their purchases to the next settlement;" but it must be understood that the greater portion of fresh bonds upon the Reduced and the New Three per Cents, now payable, was previously borrowed at moderate rates of interest. Others, Consols, and other securities, are compelled to become sellers; thereby, on Monday, stock to some extent has been disposed of to meet actual engagements. We are the more inclined to these conclusions as, in some instances, as high as 12 per cent; but most of the Bull accounts are now closed.

The new Sugar and Tea Duties having come into operation this week, about £600,000 has been paid for them at the Custom House. This large amount, of course, of course, tended to increase the demand for money.

Since we last wrote about £200,000 in bullion has been reported from various quarters. With the exception of £ 5,000 in silver imported for the East, and £100,000 in gold, which [illegible] has been sold to the Bank, the whole of the supply has been taken for the Continent.

Although the exchange at New York shows no profit on gold about £500,000 has been lately shipped to that port. This shipment has naturally added to the general distrust; but we believe we are correct in stating that the amount in question will be returned to us in silver. The value of the gold now on passage to this country is about £1,000,000.

In the early part of the week money at Hamburg was quoted at 4 per cent. Since then, however, it has fallen to 3 per cent. Loan-broke discounts have advanced 1 per cent.

The amount of bills drawn by the East India Company on Bengal and Madras, from the 26th of March to the 8th inst., was £88,384 19s 1d.

Numerous fluctuations have taken place in the value of English Stocks, and a decline of nearly one per cent has taken place in the quotations on Monday. The week was heavy, and prices were on the decline.—Three per Cents Reduced 21[illegible] to 21[illegible] ex div.; India Stock, 223½. On Tuesday lower rates prevailed, and the market was heavy:—The Three per Cents Reduced were 91[illegible] ½; Consols for Account, [illegible] ½; Ditto, for Account, [illegible] and 92[illegible]; New Three per Cents, 91[illegible] ½; New Two-and-a-half per Cents, 76; India Bonds, 8s dis [illegible] Exchequer Bills, [illegible] Exchequer Bonds, [illegible] Long Annuities, [illegible] Bank Stock, 216 to 218; Consols, 92[illegible] ½; Three per Cents Reduced, 91[illegible] ½; Consols for Account, 92[illegible] ½; Ditto, for Account, [illegible] ½; New Three per Cents, 92[illegible] ½; New Two-and-a-half per Cents, 76; India Bonds, 5

THE TALKING SHELL.

A Tale for Little People.

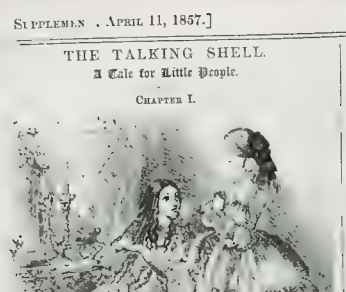
CHAPTER I.



LAURA was very beautiful. She had been called so from the hour she was born. All who sought to win the favour of her wealthy mother were never tired of praising the blue eyes and rosy lips, the round arms and delicate fingers, of the baby beauty; but, though all were lavish of their admiration, Laura's mother thought they never praised enough, for the eyes of maternal pride could discover a thousand graces which were hidden from the cold scrutiny of fawning flatterers and interested dependents. As Laura grew in years, there were many cruel enough to tell her that her lovely face and graceful figure were alone sufficient to command the esteem and respect of all, and that she had only to consult her own desire in all things to be perfectly happy. The mother of Laura was equally to blame, for, instead of teaching her to consider the cultivation of her mind and the regulation of her disposition as the chief duties of her life she was forever employed in designing some new dress or ornament, which, in reality or seemingly to the eye, destroyed the natural graces of the child and had the effect of encouraging the growth of one of the most fatal passions—vanity. At fourteen Laura was frequently quite ridiculous, for she knew that she was much admired, and every day she became desirous of attracting more attention, and in order to do so she threw herself into unnatural attitudes, and made all kinds of simpering grimaces which she fashionably thought graceful and becoming. Those who had flattered her began now to suffer the consequences of their own wickedness; for Laura never having been taught that it is our duty to be kind and gentle to all our fellow-creatures used her servants very harshly, and indulged in violent passions whenever they, through mistake or carelessness, gave her offence. Laura, though much attached to her mother, treated her with scarcely more consideration than she did her servants; for her wilfulness had obtained complete mastery over her affection. Bitterly indeed did the poor mother reproach herself; for too late she saw the mischief she had done, and the good which she had neglected.

A few weeks before Laura's fifteenth birthday her uncle, a merchant, returned from a long voyage in the Indian Seas. He was proud also of Laura's beauty, and had brought home some rich stuffs and valuable ornaments for his pretty niece, who loved him a hundred times, and called him the best and dearest of uncles. Among other presents was one of a single pearl, and this, either from its rarity, or the interest she had felt in her uncle's narration of its capture by the pearl-diver, was an especial favourite with Laura. It came from the celebrated pearl fishery at Condatchy, on the coast of Ceylon, and the pearl-diver who brought it from the bottom of the sea died from the exertion used to obtain it. Laura would sit before her looking-glass an hour at a time, placing the pearl sometimes in her hair, or round her neck, or hanging the precious toy upon her boyish forehead. She had been thus engaged on a sultry afternoon until she grew weary of the pastime, and throwing herself upon a sofa, took one of several beautiful shells which her uncle had brought also from the Indian Seas. She was still thinking of her pearl, which she intended to wear upon her approaching birthday, and wondering what everybody would say, when, unconsciously, she placed the Shell to her ear—and lo! there was a sound like the murmuring of the sea. This was the first time she had heard the sounds, though she remembered to have read a book of poetry where it was said of a shell —

> Place its polished lips unto your ear,
> And it remembers its august abodes,
> And murmurs as the ocean murmurs there.

Laura was delighted with her discovery, and continued listening to the Shell and thinking of her pearl, until she became unconscious of everything else around her. Presently she heard the Voice within the Shell speak her name. 'Yes' again it said "Laura'" She felt neither alarmed nor surprised, for she had listened to it so long that she had become familiar with the wonder.

"Well, pretty Shell," inquired Laura, "what do you want with me?"

"Are you not pleased that I can talk to you?" said the Shell.

"O very pleased replied Laura, "for I grow dreadfully weary of being alone so much and the people about me never speak of anything but my beauty. I am tired of hearing them."

Ha! Are you sure of that?" said the Shell; "you forget how often I have seen you before yonder looking-glass, and heard you say to yourself, 'Well, I certainly am very handsome.'"

O! I never said that" exclaimed Laura

But you have often thought so," replied the Shell calmly, "and I believe the power of hearing your thoughts"

Indeed!" said Laura, a little frightened

"You have often thought that for the world you would not have Caroline's merry pug nose, because some one has praised your own, which is straight; and that you would almost rather die than have Julia's gentle grey eyes, because your own are blue."

"Well, I own it," said Laura, in a very little pet; "I should hate to have a pug nose, and I'm very glad that my eyes are not grey. I can't help being beautiful, and I know I am."

"There is beauty in all things which God has made," replied the Shell.

"What! beauty in all things?" exclaimed Laura. "What! in spiders, and beetles, and and—red hair?"

"Yes, in all, did you know how to seek for it," answered the Shell. "The time may come when you will do so. At present you are too much engaged with your own prettiness to see how others equal or excel you."

"Equal me! excel me!" thought Laura.

But the Spirit in the Shell heard her, and said, "You will not believe me now; you are too vain. You think that your beauty will command always the admiration of those you wish to captivate, and that the consciousness and exercise of that power will make you happy. Gentleness, affection, self-sacrifice, and kindness are unknown to you, because they have been unsought.

"You are very rude," said Laura. "Pray, do all shells talk, like you?" asked Laura.

"No; but I am endowed with this power to benefit you," said the Shell. "I am to tell you the 'Story of a Pearl,' the sister of the one you wear upon your wrist."

"Indeed!" cried Laura. "Had my lovely pearl a sister?"

"Listen," said the Shell.

THE STORY OF THE PEARL.

"The Pearl whose story I am about to narrate to you was of the ancient family of the Aviculæ Margaritetta, one of the most renowned in the dominions of the Sea King. It had been predicted ages ago that the children of the Aviculæ should be very beautiful, and, as such, be liable to many dangers and temptations. The founder of the race was wise and prudent, and he therefore petitioned the King of the Sea to hide the exceeding beauty of his children under an exterior of the rudest form and most unattractive colour. Avicula was a great favourite with the Ruler of the Waters, and his petition was instantly granted by his Royal master. The form which Avicula selected was that of an oyster."

"What!" exclaimed Laura, "was my lovely pearl ever an oyster?"

"Even so," continued the Shell; "and it is the same upon the earth as in the waters: a rude exterior oftentimes conceals the most precious qualities. For many years the Aviculæ lived in the depths of honour in their rocky home under the sea which is called the Gulf of Manaar. One day a Cinghalese, who lived upon the Island of Lions, was displaying to his youthful bride, Otaly, his expertness as a diver in the same bright waters beneath which the Aviculæ had flourished so long; and to assure his companion, who sat upon the beach, that he had descended to the bottom of the sea, he brought up in his hand what he thought was a stone, and with a shout of triumph hurled his prize to the shore. And the hapless Avicula (for such it was) striking the sharp point of a rock was violently rent asunder.

"The diver stretched himself upon the beach nearly exhausted by his exertions, whilst Otaly proceeded to examine the novel thing which her husband had gathered from the sea. Struck with the beautiful colours of the opened shells, she scooped a hole in the sand, filling it with water, carefully washing away the particles in which the hitherto concealed pearl had been imbedded. She ran in ecstasy to her husband with the beauteous thing she had discovered, and clapped her hands with delight as she beheld the pleasure and wonder with which he regarded it.

"When they returned to the hut Otaly soon succeeded in fastening her sea gem (as she called it) to a fillet of red berries, which she bound upon her dark forehead, and then hastened to the bright stream in which she was accustomed to admire herself. Again and again she clapped her hands, for she had never seen anything so beautiful as the white pearl her husband had brought from beneath the great waters.

"The fatal gift of beauty to the Avicula was now discovered, and the evils which the founder of the family foresaw were about to visit them; for the fame of Otaly's new ornament had reached even the ears of the King, the great Hijaya. By his command fifty of the most expert divers were ordered to descend into the sea, and search for the rude shells which contained such treasures. From that time unto the present, thirty days in every year the children of the earth make war upon the descendants of Avicula, and numbers are carried away from their home beneath the waters to become the slaves of human avarice and vanity.

"At the time of one of these incursions the sister of your favourite pearl was seven years old, being the age at which the daughters of the Aviculæ Margaritetta arrive at maturity. She was known to be very beautiful, and she herself was aware of her own claims to universal admiration, and constantly did this knowledge occupy her thoughts and actions. She grew dissatisfied with the seclusion in which she lived, and longed to be taken from her quiet home beneath the waters to the world of earth, where so many of her ancestors had been carried by the pearl divers. She knew not what her fate would be in the new world which she desired to visit; but she felt sure that some great distinction awaited her, for those who sought with such labour to obtain her kindred must set a high value upon one so beautiful as she was.

"For twenty days the divers had ransacked the country of the Aviculæ, and had carried off numbers of the inhabitants; but she, who desired so much to become a captive, had hitherto escaped. She was lamenting what she considered her hard fate, when she felt herself torn from her native rock, and was sensible that she was being borne towards the surface of the sea. O how happy she thought herself in the fulfilment of her wishes! In her joy she forgot all those she had ever known or loved, and though she was but a few minutes on her passage from the bottom of the sea to the upper air she grew impatient at the delay. At length she was drawn from the water. In a moment she was oppressed by a feeling of suffocation, in which was only increased when she was tumbled with a dozen others into the bottom of a boat. What would she have given for a draught of the pleasant sea which she had so lately left, the sea which she had so lately despised, and whose soothing murmurs she was never to hear again!

"The Shell paused for a moment, and Laura heard it sigh deeply. Poor Shell! The sea had been its birthplace, and it knew that it should never see it more. After a pause the Shell continued:—

"The boat into which the unhappy Avicula was thrown contained twenty men, besides a turbaned pilot. Ten of the men were rowers and ten were divers. Of these latter, five had just been drawn up from the sea, each laden with his captives. The same number were preparing to go down as soon as the large stones of red granite which had aided their fellows to descend should be hauled up by the rowers, to which they were attached. This was soon done, and each of the fresh divers holding a net between the toes of his left foot, and the rope, to which the stone is fastened by the toes of his right foot, plunged into the sea. In about two minutes a signal was given to the men in the boat, that the purpose of the divers was accomplished, and they were drawn up again, as their fellows had been before them, their nets filled with the spoils of the deep waters. It was now noon, and a breeze blowing across the sea warmed the fishers to return. Presently a noise like thunder came booming over the waters. It was the gun which told the return of the fishers to land. From the shore were numberless rude huts and tents, with each a bazaar, or shop, before it, surrounded by thousands of people of different colours, countries, castes, and occupations. The sea was covered by a multitude of boats all returning from the same pursuit as that which contained the poor Pearl. As they severally touched the shore their anxious owners ran to meet them, and hailed with loud acclamations the number of captives with which each was laden. The unhappy Avicula were thrown roughly into baskets, and carried away to holes or pits dug in the ground, and there placed upon coarse mats; alas! to linger and die. Thus lost the vain Pearl lamented her folly, and thought more and more lovingly of her home beneath the waters. She now only desired to die in peace.

"But this was not to be. The moon arose, and again the gun was heard booming over the sea. The breeze was blowing gently from the land, and the whole fleet of boats and their crews of divers and rowers put off to renew their ravages in the deep. But the poor Avicula was past all physical pain, yet the power to feel and to remember was strangely preserved to her, for what purpose you will learn as I proceed with her story.

"After a short lapse of time the Aviculæ were taken from the pits in which they had been buried, and carefully examined by their captors, to discover their value. The Pearl whose story I am narrating far exceeded in beauty all others which the fishers had obtained, and a hundred merchants contended for the possession of her. For days she was exhibited by her master, who seemed never to tire of praising her form and colour, until she almost forgot her past sufferings in the admiration which she excited. At length a merchant was found to give the large sum required for her purchase, and by her new possessor the Pearl was carried to England, and confided to the care of a skilful artisan, who made for her a delicate framework of gold, attached to a chain of the same precious metal. When the Pearl found herself thus arrayed, all her former pride returned, and she no longer regretted her rocky home beneath the sea.

"The merchant himself was childless, but he had a niece he loved very dearly, named Adeleve; and it was for her that he had bought the Pearl, and had it placed in its costly setting. Adeleve was very beautiful; and, like the vain Avicula, she knew it, and was satisfied to be only beautiful. You can judge how proud she was of her uncle's gift, and what use she made of it. Adeleve had an idol."

"What! an idol like the ugly Joss in the drawing-room?" said Laura.

"Do not interrupt me," continued the Shell. "This idol was inclosed in a shrine, which was made of the clearest crystal, and a glittering substance resembling the purest silver. But, although the shrine was very curious, the idol was more wonderful, for its features, which were remarkably beautiful, would change their expression twenty times a day, and yet always bore a strong resemblance to those of Adeleve. In fact, it was almost like herself.

"Adeleve was never so happy as when she was decorating this image, either with flowers, or gems, or golden ornaments; and as soon as she received her uncle's costly gift she hastened to the shrine, and hung the pearl upon the forehead of her idol. The figure smiled, while an expression of great delight beamed from its eyes, and Adeleve thought it had never looked so beautiful. Hour by hour would she stand and gaze upon the object of her adoration, neglecting for its worship her studies and her duties.

"It was not that [illegible] smiled, for, at times when Adeleve had been using [illegible] a very passion, it [illegible] would assume a strange forbidding look which was perfectly frightful, and Adeleve would turn away from it, and weep with vexation. These angry moods were of such constant occurrence that it was wonderful that the idol preserved its beauty, or that Adeleve retained a servant to wait upon her; and it was only by large bribes that the dependents of her mother consented to submit to the treatment which they received. Even the Pearl, though proud of being the slave of such a lovely mistress, was often ashamed of the scenes of violence and waywardness which it was compelled to witness.

"Adeleve had but one friend, her cousin, Mary Merton; for her early playmates had grown tired of her caprices, and annoyed by her passionate disposition; but Mary Merton bore patiently with her cousin's ill humours, and only remembered her acts of kindness towards her; though she, from her gentleness, was more exposed than any one else to be treated slightingly by the young beauty. Mary was a year older than Adeleve, and could lay no claims to any personal attractions. Her features were irregular, and her eyes of no decided colour; but there was ever an expression of gentleness and good nature in her face, which more than made amends for the absence of beauty. She was always dressed very plainly, and seldom wore any other ornament than a flower or a bow of gay-coloured ribbon, thus presenting a marked contrast to her more wealthy and beautiful cousin; but her mind and disposition had been carefully trained, and all who knew Mary Merton loved her. Even Adeleve did so, as much as her own self-love would allow her to esteem another; but she never failed in her own mind to draw unfavourable comparisons between her own personal advantages and the plainness of Mary. Then Adeleve would wonder that her cousin should be always happy and contented, when even she, whom every one praised and admired, was so frequently annoyed and dissatisfied. As she had never been taught to consider the feelings of others when she desired her own gratification, she one day asked Mary if she did not wish that she were beautiful?

"No! I replied Mary, laughing merrily, 'for between Fortunatus's wishing-cap would make me so. Mamma would have nothing to tease me about if I had not a pug nose' and we often laugh heartily because papa will not admit that it is like his own. Mary and many a kiss has my poor little pug gained for me because it has been made a jest of.'

"Adeleve thought these were strange reasons to make any one satisfied with a pug nose. She wondered what could reconcile her to her straight flaxen hair.

"But surely you would like hair that would curl, Mary?' asked the beauty.

"Well, if it would always curl,' replied her merry cousin, 'but you know I like to have the wind blowing about my temples when I am gathering wild flowers in the fields, or when in good spirits run away with me, how sadly I am disposed to be a romp. My straight hair never gives me any trouble then, and I often hear merry-hearted girls like myself confess that they would gladly do as I do but for fear of disturbing their ringlets. No, Adeleve, I am quite contented to have straight hair, since it allows me to enjoy the good spirits with which God has blessed me.'

"Adeleve pitied her poor cousin, thinking, in her own ignorance, how much she had to regret. It was with this conviction that, one day when they were together in her dressing room, Adeleve proposed to her cousin to accept one of the beautiful dresses which her uncle, the merchant, had given to her.

"You are very kind, dear Adeleve,' said Mary, 'but I cannot accept your pretty dress. It is quite suited to you, but this muslin frock, with its bright cherry-coloured bows, is more fitted to me and to my station. You forget that papa is not so rich as your mamma.'

"What has that to do with it?' asked Adeleve, a little angry at the rejection of her offer. 'What has that to do with it?'

"Much, my dear cousin,' replied Mary with a smile, 'much more than you may think. I should be obliged to tell everybody this dress is a present from my cousin Adeleve, or people would be taught to be extravagant and foolish to buy me such an expensive material. Besides, I have sisters.'

"Surely they would not be censured for your appearance,' said Adeleve.

"No, dear cousin,' replied Mary, 'but it would be wrong of me to incur the chance of giving them pain; and I might do so by appearing so much more splendidly dressed than themselves.'

"Well, they might be annoyed, for what I should care,' said Adeleve, 'I would fit dress myself a fright to please anybody.'

"I hope I am not quite a fright,' replied Mary, with a laugh; 'and I deny myself nothing in refusing what you so kindly offer, yet I would do much to please you.'

"Well, you do that, I must acknowledge,' said Adeleve, 'and why, I am at a loss to discover.'

"Because there's a pleasure in pleasing others,' replied Mary.

"What when it is to your own inconvenience' exclaimed Adeleve.

"Yes, my dear cousin answered Mary. The little sacrifice we make increases the pleasure of doing a service, and without some self-denial we deserve no thanks, although we may receive them.'

"No thanks would pay me for a personal inconvenience,' said Adeleve; 'I mean to consult my own pleasure in all things—let others do as they please.'

"You must not do so if you wish to be happy,' replied Mary 'We are all dependent upon each other, dear cousin from the highest to the lowest. It is our interest as well as our duty to remember this. The love and kindness of others are necessary to our own happiness; and, therefore we should be always gentle, loving, and ready to do good.'

"What a stupid person; as would make, to be sure!' said Adeleve, evidently displeased.

"I only repeat what mamma has told me,' answered Mary; 'I am sure you would be happier if you thought so too, Adeleve.'

"I am quite happy, thank you, answered the beauty, tossing her pretty head, 'and I think you had better go down to the drawing-room while I am dressed, for I should not like my maid to hear such very strange ideas.'

"Mary left the room, and Adeleve sat herself down before the shrine which held her idol. The face of the image looked angry and perplexed, and the Pearl was very sorry for she remembered the time when she had forgotten all the kind deeds known in her native bay of being taken from [illegible] beneath the waters."

CHAPTER II.

The Shell paused, for whenever it spoke of the sea its voice was mournful and sounded like the moaning of the waves after a storm had vexed them. In a few moments it continued:

"Adeleve was now twenty-one. She had passed the last three years in the pursuit of pleasure, and a more fervent devotion to her idol. Her beauty had gained her many admirers, but the Pearl (who, like myself, had the power of understanding human thoughts) had seen how her vanity and frivolity had made her an object of ridicule. She was, however, about to be married to one as vain and foolish as herself and whom she only valued for his wealth and position in society. She thought [illegible] would give her more opportunities for display, and [illegible] be envied for the grandeur of her house and the splendour of her equipages. She knew that he was proud of her beauty, and would deny her nothing that could set it off to the greatest advantage; and for this she had consented to pass her life as the companion of a foolish coxcomb.

"Her wedding was to be the grandest of the season, and numbers were invited to see how splendidly she was to be attired, and how beautiful she would look. Her cousin had been married, a year before, to the curate (whose name was Merton also) of a small parish in the country, and it was with some difficulty that Adelevé could be persuaded by her mother to invite Mary to be present at her marriage, fearing that the simplicity of her early friend and her husband might detract from the splendour of the scene. It was well for Adelevé that she did so.

"The church was crowded with persons to witness the ceremony, and not a few gratified the vanity of Adelevé by their exclamations at the beauty both of her person and her bridal dress. "Her happiness, however, was to experience some alloy (as even at the altar her vanity had sought to gratify itself); for the church dignitary who was to have read the marriage service was taken suddenly ill, and the poor country curate, Mary's husband, had to officiate in his stead.

"The wedding party returned from the church to a sumptuous breakfast, at which were present a hundred people who cared nothing for Adelevé, and for whom she cared as little. The only persons, besides her mother, who felt any concern for the future welfare of the bride were Mary and her husband. But Adelevé treated them with marked neglect, as though she were ashamed to own relationship with two such homely people; but they felt no resentment at such conduct, for their own goodness made them ready to excuse any forgetfulness of themselves; and they returned to their own quiet village without envy of the splendour they had seen, or anger at the vain and selfish girl who had forgotten what was due to the only friend of her wayward youth.

"The Pearl, too, had received her meed of praise on that day, for she had heard the thoughts of many upon her beauty; and, in her gratitude to the mistress who had obtained for her such an opportunity to be admired, she heeded not the selfishness and vanity which she saw in the mind of Adelevé. She felt how ashamed she should have been had an unsightly oyster claimed kindred with her, when a hundred tongues were lavish in the praises of her loveliness! Poor silly Pearl! She knew not what was in store for her.

And Adelevé's image seemed in its crystal shrine as though it could never again own a vexed or angry look. Alas, it was a deceitful idol.

Time passed on, and with it Adelevé's wedded life. Her home had no charms for her, except when it afforded her the opportunities of displaying her wealth and beauty before people whom she thought envied and admired her. As she grew older she became more greedy of flattery, and those interested in pleasing her paid her the most fulsome compliments, which her vanity made her believe were the honest expressions of their thoughts. When there were none to flatter she was petulant with all about her; and, as her husband was very frequently exposed to her bad temper, she soon grew distasteful to him, and he avoided her society as much as possible. For this she cared but little, as he had long ceased to administer to her vanity, excepting by allowing her the means to dress extravagantly, and give grand entertainments. When she was not employed with these trifles she was very miserable, for she had not provided her mind with any other resources of pleasure, or cultivated her disposition to find delight in acts of kindness and benevolence, whereby her leisure and her wealth might have been made blessings to herself and others. She felt that no one really loved her; for, as she had lived for herself alone, all her friends repaid her selfishness and indifference. When this feeling was strongest in her mind she would sometimes weep very bitterly, not with sorrow at her past folly in neglecting the opportunities she had had, but with vexation at her want of influence over others. At these times she seldom visited her idol, but when she did so she saw the image with red and swollen eyes, and its dark eyebrows contracted together, making its pallid cheeks look more sorrowful. Then would she turn away from it in haste, and laugh disdainfully, as though she wished to deceive herself into the belief that her annoyance was not real. The poor Pearl, who knew the truth, was now doomed to suffer greatly; for, though she did not love her mistress, she could not witness these exhibitions of human weakness without a desire to escape from them, and she often sighed, how vainly! for the peaceful home beneath the green waters.

Again the Shell paused, as if it was thinking of the sea which it loved so well.

Adelevé had been married about four years when two events occurred which materially affected her. One was nothing less than the appearance of a new beauty, called Laura."

"My name!" cried the listening girl.

"There are many so called," continued the Shell. "The Laura of whom I speak was not only as lovely as Adelevé, but she was some years her junior. Her beauty, however, was her least claim to admiration."

"Her least claim!" exclaimed the surprised listener.

"At present you will not believe me," said the Shell; "nevertheless, I speak truly when I say that her beauty was her least claim to the admiration of those who knew her. She had been trained by good and wise parents who had sought to store her mind with the knowledge of good and truth and well had she repaid their care. Gentle to all, she was obeyed with an alacrity that proved it was a pleasure to consult the least of her wishes. Mindful of the duty she owed to those beneath her, the poor had reason hourly to bless her care of them. Grateful for the love which was shown towards her, she sought to evince her own affectionate regard for all those who were worthy of esteem. No selfish thought occupied her mind; but her greatest pleasure was in consulting the happiness of others. Rich as she rewarded; for, though she sometimes met with an ill return, she knew from many kindly acts how much others sought to show their gratitude. She had read much, and was thus enabled to converse on subjects of which Adelevé knew nothing. She was also a proficient in minor accomplishments, and sang well but naturally, and played with taste and feeling. Against such a rival Adelevé's claims to admiration were small indeed, and great was her mortification when she found herself deserted for the new beauty.

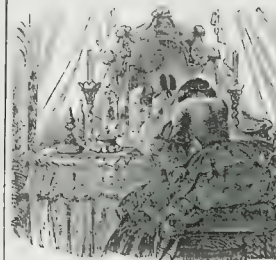
"The wicked thoughts which filled the mind of Adelevé made the Pearl tremble as she hung around the neck of her enraged mistress, and gladly would she have been the unregarded pebble upon the shore of Marmar.

"When Adelevé returned home she flew to her idol for comfort in her distress; for she believed that so long as that continued beautiful she herself should command the admiration which she coveted. The image was ghastly pale, and looked more angry than ever she had beheld it. Its eyes seemed like sparks of fire, and its features were painfully rigid. Adelevé turned away in terror, and, leaning her arms upon the marble slab above the fireplace, she hid her face in her hands. In a moment her dress was in flames. The light gauze had been drawn into the fire; but Adelevé was unconscious of her danger till aroused by a sense of pain. Her cries brought assistance but not until the fire had injured her severely. For many days her recovery was doubtful, and fever rendered her insensible. There was one who watched her day and night, and bore patiently the restlessness of the sufferer, and seemed never to tire of her painful office. That one was Mary. As soon as she heard of the accident to Adelevé she came to her instantly, for she judged rightly that her cousin would have no attendant but hired nurses. How could it be otherwise?—she never sought the good will of any, and she had made her dependants fear her. Though money could procure the services of many, the untiring care of one who loved her could not be purchased. Therefore Mary came to be her nurse. It was many weeks before Adelevé could leave her bed, and for the first time in her life she knew the feeling of gratitude. Again and again she thanked Mary for her care and tenderness without which she felt she never should have recovered. She remembered that Mary had said to her years before, 'We are all dependent upon each other.' Nor could she forget how she had scoffed at the saying.

"When Mary returned to her home Adelevé felt a loneness she had never known before, for no one came to fill her cousin's place. No! She had but one friend, and she was gone.

As strength returned Adelevé's old vanity came back also. The shrine which contained her idol had been removed from her chamber, as the surgeon, knowing the influence it had over her, had feared the effect it might produce. She now desired that the shrine should be restored to its place, and as her attendants did not care to dispute her orders her command was obeyed. When she was left alone she anxiously approached the object which contained her idol. She looked, and fainted instantly, for the image had a bright red scar upon its cheek, and she knew that she resembled it. When consciousness returned her rage was fearful. Instead of thanking the Goodness which had preserved her life she upbraided all who had ministered to her recovery, accusing them as the authors of her misfortune! Wretched Adelevé! the beauty for which she had sacrificed so much was hers no longer."

CHAPTER III.



"We will talk no more at present of Adelevé," said the Shell, "as I have much to tell you of Mary Merton.

"The village where old Ivel was in a secluded part of the country. The old grey church and modest parsonage stood upon the brow of a hill, from which you might see large tracts of meadow land, spotted over with cattle of various kinds, and here and there patches of cornfields. A bright river ran like a band of silver through the vale, turning in its course a couple of water-mills, whose noise was pleasant to hear, as it told of human life and industry. In the distance was a large wood, which stretching right and left seemed to shut out the rest of the world from this pleasant valley. The village itself was composed almost entirely of cottages, the female inhabitants of which gained a living by making pillow-lace. It was a pretty sight to see the cottagers some very young, some very old seated at the doors of their humble homes, each with a round pillow in her lap, throwing about the bobbins, which rattled merrily under the busy fingers of the workers. Twice a week in the summer time they would assemble in the parsonage orchard, and form a circle round Mrs. Merton, who read to them whilst they pursued their labour. In the winter time they all met in the school-room, on half-holidays, for the same purpose, and thus there grew up between the parson's wife and the parishioners a regard and love for each other that produced the happiest results. Mrs. Merton used her influence over her poorer friends to make them cleanly and provident housewives, whilst she derived a great amount of happiness from the affectionate regard which all professed for her.

"Soon after Mrs. Merton came to live at Cherryvale, one of the cottagers brought from the neighbouring market-town where she had been to sell her lace, two very young children, of whom she had undertaken the care. The eldest, a boy, was named Edward, and the other was called Rose. They had lost both father and mother six months before, and their grandfather, being a commercial traveller, and much away from home, had thought it better to send the children into the country, as their health was very delicate. Mrs. Morley, to whose charge they were confided, was a well-meaning woman enough, but, being very ignorant of everything except making lace, to which employment she devoted all the time she could spare from her household duties, little Edward and Rose were left very much to take care of themselves. They were so attached to each other that if they were separated for a few minutes their anxiety was instantly perceptible. If the day were fine, as soon as they had finished their breakfast of bread and milk they would take each other's hands and walk away to some quiet hedge-bank or corner of a field, and, making themselves toys of broken crockery or wild-flowers, amuse each other for hours. Sometimes they would stroll down the green lanes but ever hand-in-hand—watching with childish wonder the birds flying from hedge to hedge; or Edward would gather twigs of May-blossom or blackberries for himself and Rose—for what one had the other must share always. They seldom played with the children in the village, and when they did so Rose and Edward would be sure to sit beside each other, and very soon become silent spectators of the sport, whatever it might be. Not that they were sulky or ill-tempered children, but they seemed to be of such timid natures that they were happiest when alone. They never laughed as merry children laugh; but they would often look at each other, and smile, and were very happy in their quiet, gentle way. It was impossible for them to escape the notice of Mrs. Merton, who endeavoured to form an intimacy with the two orphans; but, kind as she ever was, and a general favourite with little people, it was some time before she could overcome the shyness of Rose and Edward.

"'Do you not like me?' said Mrs. Merton, after trying in vain to make the children cheerful.

"'O yes,' replied Edward. 'You talk to us as mamma used to do.'

"'And you loved your mamma?' said Mrs. Merton.

"The children looked at each other; and then, speaking together, said, 'Yes! yes! very much.'

"'And is that why you are not merrier?' asked Mrs. Merton.

"'I don't know,' answered the boy; 'but mamma was ill so long; and we were left alone so long; and nurse always told us to be very quiet'—and again he looked in his little sister's face for a moment, and then kissed her.

["Ah! dear ones; you who have happy homes, with out one absent face! be good and grateful, and believe in the love which seeks to guide you!]

"Mrs. Merton now understood why the children were so fond of solitude and being always together, and endeavoured more and more to make them love her. It is seldom that kindness and gentleness fail to make an impression on the young; and very soon Edward and Rose came to the parsonage every day, and, though they loved each other as much as ever, seemed happier when Mrs. Merton was with them. When they were quite at their ease with her Mrs. Merton taught them to read and write, and both Edward and Rose proved apt scholars and progressed very rapidly. Mr. Merton also took great interest in them; and, as he had no children of his own, proposed that they should live entirely at the parsonage. Their grandfather readily gave his consent, and for some years Edward and Rose lived very happily with their kind friends, repaying the care bestowed upon them by affection and diligence. At the end of this time Mrs. Merton had a severe illness. For some days it was thought that she would not recover, and when she did so it was only partially, for she could no longer walk about, but was obliged to be drawn in a garden-chair, propped up by pillows. Edward would let no one perform this duty but himself, and Rose never left the poor invalid except when rest was absolutely needful for her.

"It was at this period that Adelevé, neglected and forgotten by all her former admirers and acquaintances (for she was without true friends), thought often of the kindness of her cousin Mary, and resolved to visit Cherryvale, in order to be near the only one upon whose attentions she could rely. It was not that her misfortune had alienated those whom she used to call her friends; but, finding that she no longer attracted admiration, she had become more overbearing and captious in her manners and conduct, until every one avoided her. Her time was chiefly employed about her dress, upon which she bestowed increased attention, dressing it in the richest materials, and employing every art to hide the scar upon its forehead and the seams upon its face occasionally believing that she had concealed its blemishes but learning, often very painfully, that she had deceived her self. Her anger would then return and render her so ridiculous that those who once were disposed to pity her regarded her with contempt.

"The poor Pearl knew all this too well, and lamented that its own beauty should have made it a witness of her humiliation.

"When Adelevé arrived at Cherryvale she was grieved to see the change which illness had made in Mary Merton; but, feeble and suffering as she found her cousin, Mary's kindness and gentleness were unchanged.

"'You are very welcome, dear Adelevé,' said she, 'though I am afraid you will find me a wearisome companion after the gay friends you have left behind you.'

"'I have no friends,' replied Adelevé. 'I do not believe in friendship.'

"'You must be sceptical no longer, Adelevé,' said Mary, 'for here are two who daily prove to me that there are true friends to be found by those who have sought them. You must know these, my friends, Rose and Edward.'

Adelevé looked at the two persons referred to, and then, turning to Mary, said, 'Are these your only friends?'

"'I think not, dear Adelevé,' replied Mary; 'I hope, I know, I have many more. But, for a long time, Edward and Rose have been my constant attendants. Unwearied by my restlessness when in pain, watchful of every want, and those who are sick have many, denying themselves every enjoyment but that which they derive from their affectionate care of me. Are not those friends?'

"'Indeed, they are!' said Adelevé. 'But you were always fortunate; I had never any one to care for me. Once, indeed, I had many to flatter me and profess an admiration which they could not have felt, or I should not be abandoned by all, as I am now.

"'Not by all, dear Adelevé,' said Mary, and she held out her thin white hand.

Well, not by you,' replied Adelevé, 'or I should not have sought you. But even you I find ill and in more need of consolation than in a condition to bestow it upon me.'

"'I think not, Adelevé,' said Mary. 'True I am sorely afflicted, but I am resigned to bear my affliction. I remember well how much happiness I have enjoyed, and how little I deserved it. I feel, too, that the trifling good which I have sown has produced a most abundant harvest in the affection which now seeks to soothe my suffering.'

"'Did I not say you were fortunate?' exclaimed Adelevé, 'Where are those whom I have feasted and entertained. The dependants whom I have fed and rewarded? All, all have deserted me.

"'Are they alone to blame?' But Mary could not tell her unhappy cousin that she had committed only her own selfish enjoyment in all which she done, and that those of whom she complained had understood her motive.

"'I know what you would say,' replied Adelevé, colouring deeply—'that I have lived for myself alone. I remember well the sermon you once preached to me—that we are all dependent upon others. But I have no right to be dependent. I have wealth, I had beauty, but now what am I? But for that dreadful accident I should have been admired and followed still.'

"'Ah, dear cousin,' said Mary, 'our chastenings are for our good if we could only understand them so. Your beauty was a fatal gift to you, and you have lost it that you may gain a better nature.'

"'I have lost it to be made miserable,' exclaimed Adelevé; 'and I would that I were dead.'

"'If that wish were sincere it would be impious,' said Mary. 'I do not desire to die although my life is of hourly suffering, for I have still duties which I can perform. But you have health to enjoy the world of beauty which is around you, wealth to assist the needy not by the careless giving of alms, but by encouraging the deserving, by lending succour to the sick and aged, whose labour is done, and who now ask for a little rest before they die; to seek out the ignorant and teach them good and truth, and thus win friends whose testimony will outlive the grave.'

"Rose, who was sitting by the side of the couch, took Mrs. Merton's hand and laid her cheek upon it. The invalid looked at Adelevé and smiled, as though to call her attention to this simple evidence of the affection of the child. Adelevé observed it without any emotion, but the time came when she remembered it.

"As Mrs. Merton became daily more infirm her cousin found her visit very irksome to herself, and soon made an excuse to leave Cherryvale. She never spoke to Mary again, for a few weeks after her departure Mrs. Merton died. There were many mourners in Cherryvale, for Mary's goodness had won for her the love of all."

"O yes, I love her," said Laura, when the Shell ceased to speak. Poor Edward and Rose, what became of them?"

"They remembered the example of the one they loved, and lived to imitate her virtues," answered the Shell. "But we must follow Adelevé."

"I don't care what becomes of her," said Laura; "a vain, selfish creature."

"Yet her story, I hope, may be of use to you," replied the Shell. "Listen a little longer.

"Adelevé had taken more than ordinary pains to dress herself, and was lost in contemplation of her beloved idol when the letter announcing Mary's death was put into her hands by her servant. She paused a moment before breaking the black seal, for she anticipated the news contained in the letter. When she heard how peacefully Mary had died—how she had remembered Adelevé in almost her latest prayer—and how the grief of those to whom she had been so dear was tempered by the belief that she was now beyond the chance of change or sorrow—Adelevé was deeply touched, and, for the first time for many years, she wept tears of earnest, unselfish grief.

[And let her idol was weeping also!]. As she looked steadfastly upon it—thinking how she should die—how she should be mourned and remembered—a mist overspread the shrine, and she saw (or fancied that she saw) the face of her idol change to that of Mary. Pale and transparent as the purest alabaster the face appeared, and wore an expression of that heavenly peacefulness that Adelevé thought she looked upon a sleeping angel. Gradually it passed away, and the seared and painted features of the idol were again before her. O, how hideous it now appeared! How ghastly the living image compared with the shadow of the dead!

Adelevé rose up and hastily removed her dress and ornaments, casting them heedlessly on the floor, as though they hurt her body. The Pearl rested upon her forehead, but even that was taken off and thrown carelessly away, and, as it fell, the fire received it!

"The cruel fire (and the Shell trembled in the hand of Laura), the enemy of all things that dwell beneath the sea, closed round the poor Avicula and calcined her to dust."

The Voice in the Shell was silenced; and Laura thought she heard a deep sigh, like the sound the sea makes upon the beach when the waves are quiet, and mourning for the wrongs which they have done to brave ships and their drowned crews.

"And Adelevé?" asked Laura, after a short pause.

"She sought and found a better nature; and lived to believe the sermon Mary once preached to her," answered the Shell.

"And the shrine, and the idol? What became of them?" said Laura.

"The shrine was her LOOKING-GLASS, and her Idol was HERSELF—only herself," replied the Shell. "Like you, she was very beautiful; like you"—

"O do not say that I am like Adelevé, dear Shell! Do not say that! Let me be like the Laura of whom you spoke! Whenever you see me growing vain and selfish, and careless of my duties to others, murmur in my ear, 'Remember Adelevé!' Remember Laura."

"That must not be," said the Shell; "I have spoken for the last time. It has been permitted me to tell you the story of the Pearl: it is for you to remember."

"And I will," cried Laura. "I will, dear Shell. O, how can I thank you enough?"

"Would you, then, do even me a kindness?" asked the Shell.

"Yes, yes!" exclaimed Laura. "Anything you require of me I will do."

"Then return me to the sea—anywhere in the sea—so that I may rest again in the cool, green waves of my beloved ocean," exclaimed the Shell.

"I promise that you shall," said Laura—"soon, very soon."

And, in a voice as musical as the rippling of a little brook, the Shell murmured "Remember!"

MARK LEMON.

REPORT ON FIRE INSURANCE DUTIES.

THIS is one of the ablest Parliamentary papers we have ever perused: drawn up by Mr. George Coode, and addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The statistical information it contains, and the logic applied to facts and figures, are highly instructive. Its publication is opportune, for the reduction of the duty on fire insurance has been as strongly urged on the Government as the remission of the customs on wine and the excise on paper; but whoever reads this Report with an unprejudiced mind will arrive at the conclusion that the duty on fire insurance ought to be retained, as productive of increasing revenue with a pressure on individuals scarcely appreciable. We are aware that this is not a popular opinion, and, as it is desirable that all prevalent errors should be removed, we propose to enter fully into the subject.

The first duty on fire insurance was imposed in 1694, by the 5th of William and Mary, in these words:—"For every piece of vellum or parchment, or sheet of paper, upon which any policy of assurance shall be engrossed or written, the sum of sixpence." This rate applied to all policies, whatever the amount of property insured under them. Many variations took place between 1694 and 1815, which need not here be particularised; but, at the latter date, "the percentage duty was raised to 3s. per £100, at which rate it has remained ever since, while the Stamp-duty on the policy has remained unchanged at 1s., ever since 1804. In 1833 agricultural produce and farming stock were exempted entirely from both those duties, in consequence of the repeated crime of arson perpetrated in rural districts known as the "Swing Riots," which compelled the insurance offices to treble or quadruple the premiums, and in many cases induced them to decline all policies.

Where the offices charge 1s. 6d. the Government duty is 3s., so that the tax amounts to 200 per cent; but this is more apparent than real on a full view of the whole subject. It is to be observed that the duty is uniform on all policies; but the rate is variable, being dependent on the hazard run. Some years since the charge on warehouses and their contents in Liverpool was 36s. per £100. Owing to improved modes of construction, it has been reduced to 12s. per £100 on buildings of brick or stone, covered with tiles or slates, "which is only referible to the production of a certificate of special improvements in construction." The charge on fireproof warehouses is 3s. 6d. per £100. Where the office consider that special risk is incurred they charge three guineas, and for theatres that are accepted, which seems to be rare, five guineas per £100. Although agricultural produce, furniture, stock, implements, and utensils, are exempt from duty, the rate is 4s. per £100. The rate of 1s. 6d. only applies to ordinary risk, so that it is not true, as a universal proposition, that the Government duty is equal to a tax of 200 per cent on the charge made by the insurance offices. Thus on agricultural stock, were it subject to the duty, it would only be 75 per cent on the premium; and at the present ordinary premium on Liverpool warehouses at 12s. the duty is only 25 per cent. After much research into minute details, Mr Coode considers that, on the whole, the duty is 100, and not 200, per cent on the premium of insurance.

It is ascertained that the risk by fire is in the proportion of 1 to 6000, and that the insurable value of the contents of dwelling-houses may average, one with the other, a mean between four and five times the rental. In six-roomed houses, where the rents range from £30 to £40, the property they contain is computed at from three to five times the rent; in ten-roomed houses, rented at from £50 to £60, the ratio is commonly in a somewhat less scale; and in first classes the rule, on the whole, is about the same, though some contain objects of very considerable value, but the estimate is framed on a general average. It also appears from these inquiries that the practice of insuring from one-third to two-thirds of the appraised value effectually covers the losses incurred. On this scale Mr. Coode shows that the tax of 3s. per £100 really presses on the insurer with only a feather weight compared with the idea conveyed by the figures thus:—

If insurance be effected on two-thirds of the value of the property, the tax of 3s. on the £100 insured is one farthing in the pound sterling of the value of the property or, more exactly, as 1 duty to value of property 1536. When the insurance is effected at one-third of the value, the duty is one sixth of a penny in the pound on the property, or as duty 1 to value of property 1232. When it is effected at one-third, the duty is one-ninth of a penny in the pound, or as duty 1 to value of property 2305.

In 1856 the total value of property insured was £864,859,976, of which £262,574,000 was liable to duty, while £62,285,976 was exempt. The revenue derived from the tax was £1,203,811, and it is well to observe that at the present time, judging by the results of the last five years, the rate of progress is at an average annual increase of 18 per millions. On these facts, as a basis of reasoning, it may be asked, does the tax of 3s. per £100 limit insurance? And if it were reduced would the Government receive an equal amount of revenue on a larger sum from a lowered scale of percentage?

In considering the former of these two questions, we must avoid the common error of concluding that all the property of the country is insurable against fire, and we should also remember that there are no reliable statistics by which we can determine the real aggregate of national wealth. True, it has been estimated but with more looseness than accuracy. In the first place, then, the National Debt is not insurable, which may be put down in round numbers at £800,000,000; nor are canals and railways, though they may figure for at least half that sum. We must also exclude land its surface, and the metals and minerals in its interior—which, at thirty-three years' purchase, represents a capital of £1,550,000,000 of property; and it must be borne in mind that shipping is specially covered by marine insurance. The indestructible part of buildings must also be omitted; for the site is not affected by fire, though, in some situations, it is often of more value than the edifice constructed in it; as in the heart of the city of London and of the great provincial towns. In the aggregate, these make most serious deductions from the total of insurable national wealth.

Mr. Coode takes, as a guide, the assessment to the Property-tax of all houses in England and Wales, and puts down their insurable value at ten years of rack rental, estimated in 1855, which gives a sum of £430,000,000; or, if the rack rental be computed at fifteen years, then the insurable value would be £654,000,000: and to this Mr. Coode adds the 60,000,000 for insurable household goods and stock in trade contained in the whole £874,000,000. But we have seen that the insurance of 1856 amounted to £862,574,000; so that the margin of increase is small, even if the duty were wholly remitted. The amount here assumed gives to each man, woman, and child a contribution value of £49 per head a very liberal percentage, and probably in excess of the facts. As the result of his own inquiries Mr. Coode says: "We have seen reason to believe that the bulk of destructible and insurable property is, in fact, already insured."

We have stated that the revenue derived in 1856 amounted to £1,203,811; and here we now to consider what would be the effect of a reduction of the duty on the revenue now derived from an insured value of £862,500,000. If the duty were reduced from 3s. to 1s. 6d., property to the amount of £1,605,000,000 ought to be insured; if to 1s., £2,507,000,000; and if to 6d., £4,815,000,000. On such results it is absurd to speculate.

When the new Parliament meets it is highly probable that this subject may be revised, and therefore we have shown the impolicy of reduction in the present state of our finances.

EMIGRATION TO CANADA.—THE THROUGH TICKET SYSTEM.—On the 17th of March the Eva Mary, the first emigrant ship from Antwerp in connection with the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, under the booking-through system, sailed for Quebec. Among her passengers she carried sixty-six who enrolled themselves of the arrangements of the Grand Trunk Company, and took at Antwerp through tickets to their destination. Of these forty-one were booked for Green Bay, in Wisconsin, a distance of 1021 miles from Quebec, for £31 12s. 6d.; and twenty five to Chicago, in Illinois, 1007 miles from Quebec for £31 17s. The system thus inaugurated will doubtless be made available by many thousands during the present season, as through tickets to all stations on lines connected with the Grand Trunk are procurable at every British and Continental port whence passenger vessels sail to Canada, and the system, besides the economy of time and money arising from it, relieves the emigrant from liability to fraud and deception.

EXPERIENCES IN AUSTRALIA.

BALLARAT.

THROUGH you I wish to give to those who think of emigrating to this country my own personal experience of the colony, and a few remarks on subjects which have come under my own eye, in which I had a better reason to take an interest, and which now may be interesting to them. I am no scholar, and do not write this merely to see my words appear in print; but in hopes that it may be beneficial to many who may, as I once did, possess a craving to emigrate.

I left London about two years ago, taking a third-class passage in a large emigrant vessel. The passage I will say nothing about; I was full of hope, and, being merry as a cricket, everything that occurred—except a poor sailor tumbling overboard—gave me pleasure, and I heard "Land, O!" with delight; and, with many others, eagerly clung to the bulwarks, longing for its welcome appearance. I saw it at last: since then I have had no cause to regret that I ever did. I landed in Melbourne with £27 7s. in my pocket. Although that was more than many of my fellow-passengers had, yet I was determined to hoard it carefully, well knowing that it was my only friend. In those days there was a small spot at the foot of Russell-street, and on the banks of the Yarra, called Canvas Town named so from the number of tents pitched upon it. Into one of these tents I was received at 21s. a week. For this sum I had my meals, and a "bed-bag" to sleep upon; but, as it was very reasonable, I was satisfied. Day after day I left the little tent—hopeful at first, but, as the time wore on, with increasing anxiety, I sought everywhere, but sought in vain, for employment; and, tired, but not dispirited, I was glad enough when the time came to give the fleas their supper—as happy, perhaps, as they were to receive it.

Our tent contained, besides myself, seven young men similarly situated, so that the landlord could afford to take a daily paper. This was read, or, I should say, the advertisements were read, by one of our number, for the benefit of all; and, as he read, we pencilled down extracts which we thought would suit us, and, dropping off one by one, would hurry away in different directions to meet again amidst a crowd of applicants for the much-desired vacancy. We tried stone-breaking, and pick and shovel work upon the roads; but these jobs were not permanent, and, although the wages were good, still the money would glide away when the finished contract threw us out of employment.

About three months after my arrival I was attacked with dysentery. Some said that the water which I drank was the cause of it, but in my case I could not think so; but my mates declared that it was, and, to pass away the time in a friendly manner, would enumerate many instances of the complaint proving fatal to those who drank freely of the water without a stiffener in it. Whether it was or was not didn't matter to me a button; I had it, and it made me wish what the young men were often kind enough to express, that I could be safe and steady upon my pins again.

I was pale enough on the first day that I ventured out, and I felt that there was very little use in going to ask for a job at stone-breaking. I was very weak, and the cold perspiration covered my forehead and thin hands. The hot dust and the burning sun, the rattling wheels and the bustle and confusion of the thronged streets, made me feel very queerish indeed; but needs must, I had seen an advertisement requiring a young man of unexceptionable references, as light porter, to a boot and shoe shop. Light enough I was, God knows, but I had cheek enough to present myself, with about thirty others, as a candidate for the office. Amongst the applicants I noticed three of our first-cabin passengers. Two of them I did not know personally, but from what I had heard concerning them on board, and from their appearance, I believe that they were what they represented themselves to be—Doctors of Medicine. The other gentleman had been an officer in one of her Majesty's regiments of foot. Very fortunately for me, the boot-and-shoe merchant proved to be an old acquaintance; and I did not forget to put him in mind of this; but he was a good-hearted man, and saw that I was seedy; so he engaged me at £2 a week, and gave me £1 in advance. I remained with him for six months, and was thinking of getting married to a very industrious young washerwoman (fourteen thousand miles away from this I had seen her play the piano, knit, crochet, and botanize a bit; but she found that by these accomplishments she could not earn a livelihood in Melbourne); and, being a widow and a mother at one-and-twenty, she was obliged to wash for us and many more, to make her daily bread; but the opposition was so strong that my poor little widow was sometimes badly enough off). As I was saying, I had thoughts of getting married—a rather thoughts of asking her consent, just as a matter of form, when, colonial like, my employer one morning declared himself insolvent which settled me to a T.

I was now once more in the market struggling with men of every profession, trade, and calling. In strong bodies, and at an early hour, we besieged every hotel, shop, and warehouse, that was bold enough to enter an advertisement in the papers. Waiter, boots, groom, or lamplighter, anything that yielded a shilling a day, and a chance of more, was eagerly battled for. Our newspapers tell you to look at our colonial papers, and see the demands for labour, but they do not tell you that a hundred hungry men are ready where but one is required, and that thousands upon thousands are annually arriving to add misery to misery.

One Monday morning my old boot and shoe employer came to me and said that he was off for the diggings. He asked me what money I had, and I told him that I had 5s. 6d. in cash, and, by pawning a spare pair of trousers that I had, I thought I could raise 8s.

He wasn't a bad sort of fellow, the merchant, and must have known very well that I had no money when he came to me; so he said a few short words of pleasant and kind advice to me, and, with what meant to roll up my blankets and sling them over my shoulders. He lent me a five pound note, and said that he had two mates with him, but having no cook he thought of me, and told his mates that I would be a shilling a day. Off we started on foot for the Fiery Creek diggings, and tramped it in five days. If I tell you that I was very much pleased with the camping out in the open air, and listening to the tales of the old diggers by the camp fire you will be making away with some high flown ideas about rough jolly Bushmen, independent life, and the grand novelty of the thing. I do not wish you to do this. To some it is pleasant enough: it is pleasant to those who have a little ready money in their pockets to keep them going at the first start, but it is no longer pleasant to them when, after months of labour, they find their little stock of money gone, and the long-expected nuggets as invisible as ever.

Month after month did we struggle, hard days of heavy labour, and many a wet shirt sticking to our reeking hides showed to those around us that we did not despair: but we tore up the earth and washed it in loads to no purpose. We should have been more comfortable, and better off, had we been working in the streets of London at a shilling a day.

Hundreds of our fellow gold-seekers were doing no better. Men of capital, who could afford to hold out, in some instances drew prizes; some spent their capital and then starved. Will a paltry newspaper billet compensate such men as these for the loss of labour, capital, and the comforts which can be procured on a moderate salary at home?

Young men leave home with a letter or two of introduction, and fancy that they are all right; a few may realise their expectations; but that they are one to ten of those who do not. I had letters. I can't help laughing when I think of them. I was as proud as Punch on board, and told some of the chaps that I had friends in the colony who would soon shove me into something. Three of my letters, I was told before I left home, would only procure me acquaintances; the fourth the one on which my hopes were built—was directed to an influential man, and one who, I was told, would do everything to oblige me. As soon as I could possibly do so I called at his office and presented my letter. He glanced at me, opened it, and read it through very attentively. All right I thought: he's considering what he can do for me. And perhaps he was, and found that he could do nothing. At all events he inquired after my friends, asked the news of the war, told me that an active young man like me ought soon be able to get something, I had better look round the city, and so on, without inviting me to what most letters of introduction are worth—a dinner. He bowed me out, and that was the last I saw of him.

I am at my old work, stone-breaking, again. It's fine exercise, and a fine thing to give vent to the feelings—I always do a better day's work when I think of emigration. I shouldn't like some of you to be under my hammer when I caught you leaving old England to come out here, I can tell you; but I must be off to work; I shall find it less difficult to hammer the blue stone than hammer anything like convincing proofs of the true state of affairs into your unbelieving hearts.

I am Sir, through you, to all, a COLONIAL STONE-BREAKER.

THE CATTLE MURRAIN.—ORDER IN COUNCIL PROHIBITING THE IMPORTATION OF CATTLE, &c.

(From the Supplement to the London Gazette of April 3.)

At the Court at Buckingham Palace, the 2nd day of May, 1857,—Present, the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas it has been represented to her Majesty that certain contagious or infectious disorders are now prevalent among cattle in certain countries or places bordering upon the Baltic Sea, and that there is danger of the said disorders being introduced into this country by means of cattle and horns, hoofs, and raw and wet hides, or skins of cattle, from such countries or places: now, therefore, her Majesty, by and with the advice of her Privy Council, doth order, and it is hereby ordered, that from and after the date hereof, no cattle and no horns, hoofs, or raw or wet hides, or skins of cattle, shall be imported, or introduced into the United Kingdom, which shall come, or shall have been at any place within, those territories of the Emperor of Russia, or of the King of Prussia, or of the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, which respectively are in or border upon the Gulf of Finland, or any other part of the Baltic Sea between the Gulf of Finland and the territories of the Free City of Lubeck, or which shall come from or shall have been at any place within the territories of the Free City of Lubeck; and also that from and after the date hereof, no cattle and no horns, hoofs, or raw or wet hides, or skins of cattle, shall be imported or introduced into the United Kingdom which shall be, or shall have been, on board any vessels at the same time with any cattle or horns, hoofs, or raw or wet hides, or skins of cattle which shall have come from or shall have been at any such place as aforesaid.

And her Majesty, by and with the advice of her Privy Council, doth hereby further order that all cattle, and all horns, hoofs, and raw or wet hides, or skins of cattle, the importation or introduction whereof is so hereby prohibited as aforesaid, and also all hay, straw, fodder, litter, or manure, being or having been in or on board any vessels at the same time with any such cattle, or horns, hoofs, or raw or wet hides or skins of cattle as aforesaid, shall, upon their arrival in this country, be destroyed, or otherwise disposed of, as the Commissioners of her Majesty's Customs may direct.

And the Right Honourable the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury are to give the necessary directions herein accordingly.

THE BURIAL OF SIR JOHN MOORE.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

HAVING a short time since given, in your Journal, a statement of the circumstances attending the death and burial of that brave and lamented officer, Sir John Moore, at Corunna, in the year 1809, at which I was present—it being my painful lot, as Chaplain to the Guards, to officiate on that memorable occasion—I need only, in reply to the inquiries contained in a letter which lately appeared in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, refer the inquirer to that letter for the facts of which I was an eye-witness and a participator in, and of which I should suppose no further corroboration could be necessary. But if your Correspondent wishes to have them corroborated by another person present on that memorable occasion I would refer him to the present Commander-in-Chief in Ireland, whom I assisted in bearing Moore coffin to the grave and depositing it there, as described in the quotation to which I now refer, from the account given of it by the General's brother, in "A Narrative of the Campaign of the British Army in Spain commanded by his Excellency Lieutenant-General Sir John Moore, K.B., &c. Authenticated by Official Papers and Original Letters." By James Moore, Esq. The 4th Edition. London: Printed for J. Johnson, St. Paul's Churchyard. 1809.

Page 366. "At twelve o'clock at night the remains of Sir John Moore were carried to the citadel by Colonel Gresham, Major Colborne, and the Aides-de-Camp, and deposited in Colonel Gresham's quarters. A grave was dug by a party of the 9th Regiment, the Aides-de-Camp by turns attending. No coffin could be procured, and the body was never undressed, but wrapped up by the officers or his staff in a military cloak and blankets. Towards eight o'clock in the morning some firing was heard. It was soon resolved to finish the interment, lest a serious attack should be made, on which the officers would be ordered away, and not suffered to pay the last duties to their General. The officers of his family bore the body to the grave; the funeral service was read by the Chaplain, and the corpse was covered with earth.

A SWORD OF THE "SIX HUNDRED."—We saw and handled yesterday a relic of Balaclava, in the shape of a sword wielded by Lord Leveson Gower in the famous charge of the "Six Hundred." It is a Scottish claymore of great antiquity, having been in the possession of the Leveson family for several centuries, made of the finest tempered steel, with basket hilt of the same material, and it measures about three feet from point to guard. The owner presented it to Captain Du Riviere, of the Zouaves, the present possessor, who honoured him while lying on the field of Balaclava, desperately wounded. The scabbard is dented in several places by the hoofs of horses, and the hilt is slightly injured by the thrust of a Cossack's lance. The relic is in the keeping of a brigade not so recent but that this relic of the event possesses considerable historic interest.—New York Evening Post.

THE RELIEF OF THE POOR IN ENGLAND.—According to a return moved for by Mr. Bouverie, just before the dissolution of the late Parliament, of the money expended for in and out door relief in every county in England and Wales for the half-years ending Michaelmas, 1856, and Lady-day, appears that the total amount expended for the relief of the poor in the 13,158 parishes in England was for 1855, £1,305,385; and in 1856, £1,323,393; thus shewing a decrease on the latter year of £18,008, or 1½ per cent. The population of the parishes for which the returns are issued is 15,541,851 (Census of 1851). The expense of relief on the total population is, therefore, about 2s. 4½d. per head for the half-year. In Wales, in the 1019 parishes, and a population of 1,163,000, the expense of poor relief was in 1855, £131,441; and in 1856, £137,634, showing an increase in the latter half-year of £6193, or about 4·7 per cent. The cost of the maintenance of the poor in Wales upon the total population is, therefore, greater than in England, being 2s. 6½d. for each person.

THE INCOME-TAX.—The reduced income-tax came into operation on Tuesday last. Henceforth parties receiving £150 and upwards will only have to pay 7d. in the pound, in place of 1s. 4d., as heretofore; and those exceeding £100, and not amounting to £150, 5d., in place of 1s. The contributors under schedule D will not, however, receive the full benefit of the alteration for some time to come. They will still practically have to pay the higher rate for the greater portion of the ensuing year, inasmuch as the greater portion of the arrears to and for the 5th inst. will not, and cannot be, collected before Christmas, or perhaps April next.

THE EUPHRATES VALLEY ROUTE TO INDIA.

It has often been remarked by political philosophers that the great highways of the Romans materially contributed to the consolidation of their empire. They stretched away from the central terminus or point of departure near the Temple of Saturn in the Roman Forum, to the most distant provinces. There Augustus erected a column, the Miliare Aureum, or Golden Milestone, on which were inscribed the distances to the principal cities of Italy. The roads were duly terminated by the frontiers of the Empire. "If," says Gibbon, "we trace the distance from the wall of Antoninus to Rome, and from thence to Jerusalem, it will be found that the great chain of communication from the north-west to the south-east of the Empire was drawn out to the length of four thousand and eighty English miles." Along those roads, flagged, not paved, it was easy to travel one hundred miles a day. "As an example of rapid travelling in the later periods of the Empire," the great historian adds, in a note to the passage just quoted, that "in the time of Constantius, Casarius, a principal officer of the high rank, went post from Antioch to Constantinople. He began his journey at night, was in Cappadocia (105 miles from Antioch) the ensuing evening, and arrived at Constantinople the sixth day about noon. The whole distance was 795 Roman, or 695 English miles." This rate of travelling is not to be compared with the speed attainable by modern railways; but it was prodigious during the Roman Empire, wonderfully facilitating the despatch of imperial orders and centralising the more important operations of the colossal government. The example should not be lost on the statesmen of England.

Among the most grandly useful projects of our times are those which aim at connecting Asia and Europe by the triple agency of railways, electric telegraphs, and steam-ships; and among them one of the most judiciously contrived is the route to India by the Euphrates valley, proposed by Mr. W. P. Andrew. This magnificent scheme is recommended both by political and commercial considerations. We all remember the avidity with which the late Emperor of Russia desired to appropriate to himself the inheritance of the "sick man" at Constantinople; and every watchful Englishman is well aware how craftily his successor is seeking to reduce Persia to a state of vassalage. It is our duty, and our interest combined with our duty, to defeat this project, not by the seizure and annexation of territory to the British Crown, but by rendering both the Sultan and the Shah self-sustaining through the extension of commerce and the introduction of Western arts, Western science, and Western civilisation. In barbarous nations some highly-gifted individuals may, by force of native genius alone, rise to the dignity of true greatness, but the great body of the people can only be improved by coming into contact with foreign peoples of superior intelligence.

Two rival schemes for connecting Europe and Asia are before the public — one by cutting a ship canal through the Isthmus of Suez—the other by a combination of railway and ocean steamers along the Euphrates Valley and the Persian Gulf. Both have their merits; but the latter has the advantage in the economy of time and distance as between England and British India, as the following comparison demonstrates:

For the conveyance of troops, passengers, mails, &c. from England vîa Egypt to the Punjaub and Upper India, to the north west of Delhi, the route by Kurrachee and the Indus is shorter by more than 2700 miles than by Calcutta and the Ganges, and what the Euphrates Valley route is established, the distance between London and Lahore or Delhi by the Indus will be more than 3700 shorter than vîa Suez and Calcutta, the distance from London to Lahore being

By the arrangements now proposed, India will be reached in fifteen or sixteen days, or in about half the time now occupied.

When the railway is completed from Seleucia to Bussorah the time occupied will be 13 days 18 hours.

Along the Syrian coast there is no harbour so susceptive of improvement as Seleucia, where the massive works of the Romans still remain. By extending the great mole which they constructed the whole mercantile navy of England would obtain a secure port of refuge; and to complete this most useful work General Chesney and Captain Allen, R.N., consider that a trifling outlay of from £20,000 to £30,000 would be sufficient. From Seleucia to Antioch the distance is eighteen miles; Aleppo is forty-two miles from Antioch, containing 90,000 inhabitants, and being the emporium of Syrian trade. The importance of this projected railway will best be appreciated by reminding the reader that the Euphrates gives a water communication to the central districts of Syria, Asia Minor, and Asia Major, and with the south of Persia and Kurdistan. This portion of the world, it is well known, abounds in all the elements of material wealth; and it is our mission to elevate the character of the people, to root out their prejudices, to form them to habits of patient industry, to conquer their sloth, to teach them that they will gain more by commercial pursuits than by predatory and marauding expeditions. Surely there is nothing Utopian in the hope that the ancient glory of Bagdad and of Bussorah may be revived? Nor is it a rash prediction that the valleys of the Tigris and Euphrates may again become the seats of mighty empires, or that the Persian Gulf may become an Oriental Adriatic. Civilised Europe, abandoning the horrors, the cruelties, and the waste of war, may direct its energies to the restoration of Babylonia and Chaldea, and plant Christianity on the ruins of a decaying superstition.

KUNDEY RAS, THE GUICOWAR OF GOOJERAT, AND HIS DAUGHTER. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.

THE GUICOWAR OF GOOJERAT.

As Eastern affairs at present occupy so prominent a position, and seem likely to awaken a still-increasing interest, the accompanying Portrait of his Highness the Guicowar (from a photograph taken a few weeks since at his palace in Baroda), who has lately ascended the throne of Goojerat, may prove acceptable to our readers. His Highness is seated with his daughter on his knee. His dress is of the richest silk, the borders embroidered with gold and pearls; while the brilliancy and value of his jewels almost realise the most gorgeous imaginings of the much-exaggerated Eastern magnificence.

Kundey Ras has a pleasing, intelligent expression of countenance. He appears to possess great muscular strength, and is a capital shot. He also rides and hunts beautifully, using a European saddle, and top-boots, and is a perfect Nimrod. As he has never hitherto been addicted to the miserable excesses which disgraced the reign of the late Guicowar, it is to be hoped his energy and intelligence will ensure to his dominions as much good government as we can hope to see developed in a native Court. At present his liberality of sentiment, and apparently eager desire to be on the most friendly terms with the British, promise much. He expresses the utmost interest in our success against Persia, and has even proposed to pay and equip a regiment of infantry and a battery of artillery in our service; and, when the news of the taking of Bushire arrived, he immediately ordered a Royal salute to be fired. Doubtless much of this good understanding may be attributed to the admirable management of the present Resident, and to his firm but kind and friendly treatment. Still, at the present crisis of our Indian affairs, the fidelity and good feeling of the native Princes ought to be more than ever valued. His Highness has as yet only reigned for two or three months, and of course things are at their brightest. It remains to be proved whether his liberality extends so far as to permit the spread of European civilisation and Christian education, which have hitherto made lamentably little progress among the people of Goojerat.

BUNDER DEELUM.

THE accompanying view of one of the numerous forts in the Persian Gulf has been sketched from the deck of the Hon. East India Company's steam-vessel Berenice by Assistant Surgeon L. S. Bruce, H.C.S. It affords a good specimen of the forts of the coast, as well as a view of the mountain scenery.

BUNDER DEELUM, IN THE PERSIAN GULF.

Mr. Bleming, in his "Journal of Two Years' Travel," just published, describes the coast of Persia as now presenting no view but sterile, barren, and desolate chains of rocks and hills; and the general aspect of the Gulf is dismal and forbidding. Moore's charming allusions to Osman's Sea, with its—are, unfortunately, quite visionary, for uglier or more unpicturesque scenery our traveller never beheld.

SKETCHES IN CHINA.

To our obliging Correspondents we are indebted for the accompanying characteristic groups and view of Chinese life.

The first is a group of Peasant Women of Foochow, remarkable for their fantastic head-dresses. One of the figures shows the usual method of carrying articles in baskets. The second group illustrates the costumes peculiar to the northern part of Kwang-tung. The members of the group are of various grades:—First are a nurse and child; next, a fisherman; then, two unmarried females; and, lastly, a married lady. In the background are seen portions of houses of the district.

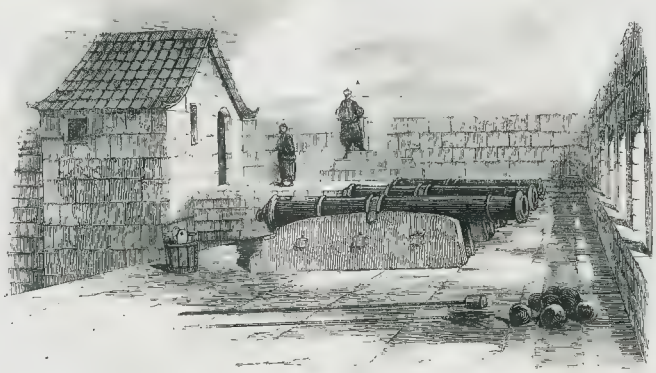
The two accompanying Sketches show prominent and well-known spots in the town of Victoria, Island of Hong-Kong.

First is the east side of Pedder's Hill, late the Harbour-master's residence and office, 84 feet above and 30½ from high-water mark. This View is taken from the 3 gun battery in front of the new Government offices.

Next is a north-east view of Victoria Peak, 1800 feet high, taken from the Harbour master's Flagstaff, showing Caine's House, late the residence of Governor Sir John F. Davis, Bart. Below is a Chinese Bungalow, the first solid building erected on Hong-Kong as a European residence in 1841, by the present Lieut.-Governor, Col. Caine; to the right, on the slope of the hill, the Magistracy and Prison compound.

These Sketches were taken by the late Arthur V. Johns, Esq., H.C.S., and will be easily recognised by any one who has visited the colony.

The Fort represented in the next Illustration is named Kowloon, and lies opposite Hong-Kong. Even in their guns the Chinese show their fondness for colour; those of Kowloon Fort being black with red muzzles and mouldings, and mounted on black carriages.



KOWLOON FORT, OPPOSITE HONG-KONG.

Apropos of Chinese artillery, the Moniteur de l'Armée says

A very curious discovery was made by the English during the late attack upon Canton, and one which will serve to illustrate the history of the use of artillery. The landing-party, which was sent ashore after the English vessels opened their fire, found in one of the forts upon the river, from which the garrison had been expelled, a battery of six bronze pieces of artillery, of the calibre of 18 lb., the peculiar shape of which attracted the attention of the officer in command of the detachment. These cannon were stamped near the touchhole with the Imperial cipher, surrounded with Chinese characters, inclosed within a series of arabesque very gracefully designed. In the middle of these ornaments was a cross, in relief, and below the cross was the date of 1697 in Roman letters. One of the cannon was put on board the Admiral's flag ship, to be sent to England; the others were spiked. Investigations which were afterwards made show the origin of them. The cipher which they bear is that of the Emperor Kong Hi, one of the most eminent of the Chinese Sovereigns, who was born in 1653, and died in 1723. This Monarch admitted the Jesuits to his Court, and employed them in different branches of his administration. One of them, the Père Bouin, was charged with the superintendence of the cannon foundry at Nankin, and this is probably a specimen of his workmanship.

The lower View is a picturesque scene upon the Canton River—a Fort, with Chinese buildings, &c.

THE EARL FITZWILLIAM'S HUNT.

THE kennels of the Fitzwilliam hounds are at the Earl's usual residence, Milton Park, three miles from Peterborough, which four railways intersect, and eleven miles from Stamford.

The Fitzwilliam pack was established by the father of the present Earl between seventy and eighty years ago; they are maintained entirely at his expense, and hunt four days a week over a north-east strip of Northamptonshire and Huntingdonshire—a wide, wild, thinly populated district, with some fine woodlands; a country that was almost all grass, until deep draining turned some cold clay pastures into arable. It holds a rare scent, and the woodland country can be hunted, when a hot sun does not bake the ground too hard, up to the first week in May, which, in most other countries, horns are silenced. The country is wide enough, with foxes enough, to bear hunting six days a week. "Bless your heart, Sir," said an old farmer, "there be foxes as tall as donkeys, as fat as pigs, in these woods, that go and die of old age."

The Fitzwilliam are supposed to be the biggest-boned hounds now bred, and exquisitely handsome. If they have a fault, they are, for want of work, or excess of numbers, rather too full of flesh, so that, at the end of the year, when the days grow warm, they seem to tire and tail in a long run.

The fences are big enough to keep out a bullock, the ditches wide and full of water, bullfinches are to be met with, stiff rails, gates not always unlocked; so although a Pytchley flyer is not indispensable, on a going day, nothing less than a hunter can get along.

Tom Sebright, as a huntsman and breeder of hounds, has been a celebrity ever since he hunted the Quorn, under Squire Osbaldeston, six-and-thirty years ago. Sebright looks the huntsman, and the huntsman of an hereditary pack, to perfection: rather under than over the middle height; stout without being unwieldy; with a fine full, intelligent, and fresh-complexioned oval countenance; keen grey eyes; and the decided nose of a Cromwellian fireside. A fringe of white hair below, and a broad bald forehead, when he lifts his cap to cheer his hounds, tell the tale of Time on this accomplished veteran of the chase.

"The field," with the Fitzwilliam, is more aristocratic than fashionable, it includes a few peers and their friends from neighbouring noble mansions, a good many squires, now and then undergraduates from Cambridge, a very few strangers by rail, and a great many first-class yeomen farmers and graziers. Thus it is equally unlike the fashionable "cut-me-down" multitude to be met at coverside in the "Shires" par excellence, and the scarlet mob who rush, and race, and lark from and back to Leamington and Cheltenham. For seeing a good deal of sport in a short time, the Fitzwilliam is certainly the best within a hundred miles of London. You have a first-rate pack, first-rate huntsman, a good scenting country, plenty of foxes, fair fences to ride over, and, though last not least, very courteous reception, if you know how to ride and when to hold your tongue and your horse.

I had three days with the Fitzwilliam last season—two in the woodland, when a burning sun destroyed every vestige of scent. The hounds working most beautifully could make nothing out, even when the fox had just crossed a ride before our eyes the instant before they came up—this being repeated not once but a dozen times, so that we had only a few disappointing scurries over some damp meadows. As there are fine open drives cut in every direction through these woods, and a country of large inclosures for a fox to fly across when forced, it is well worth resorting to in a damp spring when fox-hunting has closed up in the corn counties. My fortunate day with the Fitzwilliam was in their open pasture, Huntingdon country. My head-quarters were at the celebrated "Hagcock," which is known, or ought to be known, to every wandering fox-hunter, standing as it does in the middle of the Fitzwilliam Hunt, within reach of some of the best meets of the Pytchley and the Warwickshire, and not out of reach of the Cottesmore and Belvoir. It is much more like a Lincolnshire Wolds farmhouse than an inn. The guests are regular hunting men, and you find yourself in a sort of foxhunting club-house, in a large, snug dining-room, not the least like Albert Smith's favourite aversion, a coffee-room; you have a first-rate English dinner, undeniable wine, real cream with your tea; in a word, all the comforts and most of the luxuries of town and country life combined. If report and Percival will provide you with a flyer for every day in the week, and you will be sure to meet with one or two guests, able and willing, ready to canter with you to cover, explain the chart of the country, and, if you are in the first year of boots and breeches, show you an Squire Warburton sings, how "To sit down in your saddle and put his head straight." So said Piccadilly Anderson, and sent a horse-loving New Yorker, anxious to see foxhunting, down to the Haycock. Transatlantic commenced his career with more pluck and success than judgment, by riding over five first-rated grass in one day. The walls of the dining-room show his grateful recollection of a pleasant fifteen days, in a series of lithographs of American trotters in harness, more hideous than even winners of the Derby; however, they furnish conversation for the temporary tenants of the before-mentioned arm-chaired and Turkey-carpeted, well-screened, lighted, and fire-blazing foxhunters' rest.

The meet, within four miles of the inn, was in a park by the side of a small firwood plantation. Punctual to a minute, up trotted Sebright on a compact, well-bred chestnut in blooming condition, the whips equally well mounted on thoroughbreds, all dressed in ample scarlet coats and dark cord breeches—a style of dress in much better taste than the tight, short dandified costume of the fashionable hunt, where the huntsman can scarcely be distinguished from the "swell."

Of the Earl's family there were present a son and daughter, and three grandsons, beautiful boys, in Lincoln green loose jackets, brown cord breeches, black hats and caps, with the same scarlet rosette and short cock of their superiors all on a well-groomed chestnut pony, as well as the huntsman on the field, he looked as big full of genuine enthusiasm, stopping at nothing practicable.

Amongst others present was a tall, lithe, white-haired, white-moustached, dignified old gentleman, in scarlet and velvet cap, riding forward on a magnificent grey horse, who realised completely the poetical idea of a nobleman. This was the Marquis of H——, known well forty years ago in fashionable circles as Lord IV. was Prince now popular and much esteemed as a country gentleman and improving landlord. There was also Mr. H ——, an M.P., celebrated, before and after he settled his place and crossed to him, as a and red bishops a fanbelt decking on, in breeches and patent napoleons; with his wife on a fine bay horse, who rode boldly throughout the day.

In strange countries I usually pick out a leader in some well-known farmer; but this day I made a grand mistake, by selecting for my guide a very gentlemanly fellow in a black hat and neat, white cords, and boots on a young chestnut—never dreaming that my quiet man was Alec , a farmer truly, but also a provincial celebrity as a steeplechaser.

The day was mild, cloudy, with a gentle wind. We drew several covers blank, and found a fox, about one o'clock, in a small spinney, from which he bolted at the first summons. A beautiful picture it was to see gallant old Sebright get his hounds away, the ladies racing down a convenient green lane, and the little Fitzwilliam, in Lincoln green, charging a noble flight of hurdles. In half-an-hour's strong running I had good reason to rejoice that Percival had, with due respect for the fourth estate, put me on an unmistakable hunter. Our line took us over big undulating fields (almost hills), with on the flats or valleys a large share of willow-bordered ditches (they would call them brooks in some counties), with third-rate timber dotted between the pollards. At the beginning of the run my black-coated friend led me much as a dog in a string leads a blind man—at a great pace, into a farmyard, thus artfully cutting off a great angle, over a most respectable stone wall into a home paddock, over a stile into a deep lane, and then up a bank as steep as a gothic roof, and almost as long, into a fifty acre pasture, where, racing at best pace, we got close to the hounds just before they checked, between a broad unjumpable drain and a willow bed: two fine resources for a cunning fox. There I thought it well, having so far escaped grief to look after a horse who was beat a hundred yards back for breath. In the mean time Sebright, well up, hit our friend off with a short cast forward, and after five minutes' slow hunting, we began to race again over a flat country of grass, with a few big ploughed fields, fences easier, ladies and ponies well up again. After brushing through two small coverts without hanging, we came out on a series of very large level grass fields, where I could see the grey horse of the Marquis, and the black hat of my first leader sailing in front; a couple of stiff hedges and ditches were got over comfortably; the third was a regular bullinch, six or seven feet high, with a gate so far away to the right that to make for it was to lose too much time, as the hounds were running breast high. Ten yards ahead of me was Mr. Frank G——, on a Stormer colt, evidently with no notion of turning; so I hardened my heart, felt my bay nag full of going, and kept my eye on Mr Frank, who made for the only practicable place beside an oak-tree with low branches, pushed along his head, popped through a place where the hedge showed daylight, with his hand over his eyes in the neatest possible style. Without hesitating a moment I followed, rather too fast and too much afraid of the tree, and pulled too much into the hedge. In an instant I found myself torn out of the saddle, balanced on a blackthorn bough, fortunately I wore leathers, and deposited on the right side of the hedge on my back; whence I rose just in time to see Bay Middleton disappear over the next fence. So there I was alone in a big grass field, with strong notions that I should have to walk an unknown number of miles home Judge of my delight as I paced slowly along—surmising, was of no use—at seeing Frank G—— returning with my truant in hand. Such an action in the middle of a run deserves a Humane Society's medal To struggle breathless into my seat; to go off at score, to find a lucky string of open gates, and upon the hounds at a check, was my good fortune. But our fox was dooming me to another quarter of an hour at a hand gallop we hunted him into a shrubbery, across a home field into an ornamental clump of laurels, back again to the plantation, where a couple and a half of leading hounds pulled him down, and he was brought out in the open. He was dead and almost stiff, without a mark regularly run down by an hour and twenty minutes with two very short checks. Had the latter part been as fast as the first, there would have been very few of us there to see the finish.

Returning slowly, I had time to snatch a hasty luncheon got into the right cover-hack, and rode over to Uppingham, about twenty miles across the wild range of hills between Northamptonshire and Rutlandshire, into Leicestershire, in the midst of the Cottesmore country, where I saw some abominable crooked ploughing; and arrived just in time to dine at Keythorpe Hall with the party of our Central Farmers Club, invited by Lord Berners to inspect his remarkable agricultural improvements, and to relate the story of the day to an ex-master and one of the oldest members still riding of the Quorn Hunt.

A WARNING TO UNPROTECTED GENTLEMEN-TRAVELLERS.—The saloon is fitted up "regardless of expense," with the costliest gilding, carpeting, and furniture of every kind. The cookery, dinner service, and table appointments would do credit to the most splendid hotels either in the New or Old World. A small cabret is supplied to the passengers in many of the boats, if not ad lib, at least in tolerable sufficiency. This is a relic of the old French times, when Louisiana was a French province and the Mississippi a French stream. The lower end of the saloon, that next the stern, is partitioned off by doors and stained glass, so as to form a handsome drawing-room, generally supplied with a piano, and often with a great number of those elegant nothings which are the drawing-room their charm. To this none but ladies, or gentlemen who have ladies in charge, are admitted. This is the harem, the women's apartment, the sanctum sanctorum of the boat. The profane vulgar, who congregate around the stove forward and spit upon it, shrink from approaching its sacred precincts with as much reverential awe as Gibour from a mosque. All through the Southern States of the Union, but particularly in the Mississippi boats, to travel without a lady places a man in a position, if not of degradation, at least of very marked inferiority. The ladies and their cavaliers, on board the Princess, lived altogether apart from the rest of the passengers. Although there was no difference whatever in the price of the places, there was a broad line drawn between the inmates of the harem and the unhappy swains who had no women to protect them, in between cabin and steerage passengers in England. The former had their cards placed on their state-room doors reserved for them at every meal. When the bell rang no one dared to sit down until they were each first seated. The rest of us stood in a hungry crowd about the door, and as soon as we saw the last Emperor unfurled installed by the side of the fair charge, his napkin on his knee, we were let loose and flung ourselves upon the table, and then upon our food, which was of course despatched in a very few minutes. The whole proceeding was extremely humiliating and disgusting; no man who had a particle of self respect could go through it with equanimity. Letters of an English Traveller in the Daily News.

COTTON FROM ALGERIA.—The Moniteur publishes the report of the jury charged to award the prize of honour given by the Emperor annually for the best and largest cotton plantation as an encouragement for the cultivation of cotton in Algeria. The jury, in awarding on the great field trial which proved during the last season at Boufarik, on the land which Mr. Jumel has devoted to cotton plants, large quantities having been sown for that purpose. The competition was opened by the jury in an organised manner, and the cotton plant was subjected to the same conditions, the quantity produced for the ensuing year being the only point to be considered. The result was a triumph for Mr. Jumel, and the extent of ground under cotton cultivation amounted to eight hectares, or about twenty acres. The plantations intended to compete for the Emperor's prize were in extent six hectares, being more than the preceding year. The report states that the cultivation of the plant had not extended into parts of the country where it had not before been attempted. The report observes on the improvement which has taken place since the preceding seasons in the management of the plants, and which cannot fail to develop itself still more when the planters have acquired more practical experience. The jury, by way of encouraging their exertions, allude to the commencement of cotton cultivation in America. In that country, as in Algeria, the growth of cotton has preceded that of cotton. In 1785, the United States only exported 14 bales of cotton; in 1786, 6; in 1787, 109; in 1788, 389; and in 1789, 41. Thus, at the end of four years, the annual export of the United States had not reached 500 bales whilst at the end of the third season the export from Algeria has exceeded 600. The planters in Algeria have already obtained two important points towards competition with the United States—quality and superabundance of the product. The jury, however, considers that the latter is attained and that as the extent of production which can be successfully cultivated when the number and the employment of the settlers increased.

HOW GAMBLING WAS PUT DOWN IN NATCHEZ.—Natchez owes its origin and growth rather to the tide of colonisation which flowed from New Orleans up the banks of the Mississippi than to that which rolled westward from the Carolinas and from Virginia. It is consequently much older town than any other in the interior or the State. It was established and flourishing when the greater portion of the interior of Mississippi was still a howling wilderness. Some years ago it acquired unenviable notoriety by becoming the head-quarters of bands of robbers, nigger-stealers, and gamblers who had been expelled by from other towns. In short, it became, at length, appear for some time to have had the town so completely in their hands that the citizens were obliged to shut themselves up in their houses after nightfall and sleep without other protection than their weapons and their good luck. Things at last reached such a state that a vigilance committee was formed, and the rowdies were requested to "absquatulate." The greater part accordingly took their departure, many of them for Texas. A good many proved contumacious, and refused to go; the result was, that in the course of the time allowed them for decamping the enraged and virtuous citizens lynched them en masse. Since then Natchez has been as peaceable and orderly as any town in the Union in which the "peculiar institution" is allowed full sway, and the action of vigilance committees, ever roused, is directed against those enemies of property known as Abolitionists.—Letters of an English Traveller in the Daily News.

TREASURE IN SAFETY.—A tradesman of the Rue Montmorency, at Paris, being greatly afraid of being robbed, secreted his money in different parts of the house, and did not even let his wife know where. One of his hiding-places was the top of his shop, in which a fire had not been lighted for a long time, and in this place he deposited a number of bank-notes of the City of Paris, several bank-notes and securities, together with a not inconsiderable sum in pieces of 20 fr. and 40 fr. One day his wife, finding it rather cold, ordered the servant to light a fire in the stove. She was obeyed; and in about half an hour after her husband came home. On seeing the fire he uttered a loud cry, and, sinking on to a chair, broke out into the most pitiable lamentations. It was some time before he could explain to his wife the cause of his grief. She at once had the fire extinguished; but, though the pieces of gold, greatly blackened, were found, the notes and securities had evaporated.

EXTRADITION OF CRIMINALS.—The Giornale di Roma, of the 27th ult., publishes a convention just concluded between the Holy See and Austria for the extradition of criminals. The convention contains no clause in favour of political refugees, but provides that, if an Austrian subject commit a crime in the Pontifical States, and then seek refuge again on the Austrian territory, the right of extradition shall not apply, and conversely, but that he shall be judged by the tribunals of his own country.

THE OLD MASTERS OF DEFENCE.

In Number V. of Routledge's "Shakespeare" is a very curious note to a passage in "Romeo and Juliet, act ii., scene 4, ('A duellist, a duellist; a gentleman of the very first house—of the first and second cause. Ah, the immortal passado! the punto reverso! the hay!"), on those celebrated teachers of the duello who were so much in vogue in England towards the end of the sixteenth and beginning of the seventeenth century, and are so frequently alluded to by the dramatists of the period.

"In George Silver's 'Paradoxes of Defence,' London, 1599, 4to, it is stated that there were three 'Italian Teachers of Offence,' the first of whom was Signior Rocco, who had come into England about thirty years before. 'He disbursed a great summe of money for the lease of a house in Warwicke-lane, which he called his colledge, for he thought house in Warwicke-lane, which he called his colledge, for he thought it a great disgrace for him to keepe a fence-schoole; he being then the only famous maister of the arte of armes in the world.' He taught none commonly under twentie, forty, fifty, whole world. He taught none commonly under twentie, forty, fifty, or an hundred pounds.' To be, therefore, a gentleman of such a house as this, was really 'a very ribband in the cap of youth.' In the same tract occurs a curious illustration of another expression in the same speech of Mercutio, 'the very butcher of a silk button.' 'One Austen Bugge, a verie tall gentleman of his handes,' resolved to encounter Bugge, a verie tall gentleman of his handes,' resolved to encounter Signior Rocco and went to another house which he had in the Blacke-Signior Rocco and went to another house which he had in the Blacke-friars and called to him in this manner—'Signior Rocco! thou that friars and called to him in this manner—'Signior Rocco! thou that art the onelie cunning man in the world with thy weapon, thou that takest upon thee to hit and Englishman with a thrust upon one button: thou that takest upon thee to come over the seas to teach the valiant noblemen and gentlemen of England to fight; thou cowardly fellow, come out of thy house if thou dare for thy life! I am come to fight with thee.'

"The expression, 'A gentleman of the very first house,' has been, however, usually understood in a genealogical sense, in which form it occurs also in Beaumont and Fletcher's "Women Pleased," act i., s. 3:—

——— a gentleman's gone then,
A gentleman o' the first house! There's the end on 't!

Warburton supposed the allusion was to Tybalt's pretending to be at the head of his family; to which Steevens objects that Capulet and Romeo were both before him; but the truth is that neither of them at all interfered with such claim. Romeo was of the house of Capulet only by marriage with Juliet; and in the list of persons represented in the tragedy Tybalt is called Nephew to Lady Capulet. The real heraldical reference, if that be the genuine sense of the passage, appears to have been quite overlooked. When the bearing of armorial ensigns became reduced to a science, a series of differences was instituted, the more readily to distinguish between the arms borne by the several sons and descendants of the same family, and to show their order and consanguinity. They consisted of six small figures called a label, crescent, mullet, martlet, annulet, and fleur-de-lis—which were always to be placed in the most prominent part of the coat armour. These signs, borne singly, were for the sons of the original ancestors, who constituted that which heralds denominated 'the First House.' The issue of these sons formed 'the Second House,' and carried their differences doubled; beginning with a crescent surmounted of a label, a crescent of a crescent, and so of the rest. It was ordained by Otho, Emperor of Germany, that the eldest son of the first member of the First House should be preferred in dignity before his uncle; and the same regulation was also established in France, and made to include females. Tybalt was, therefore, the eldest son of Lady Capulet's elder brother; and, without pretending to be at the head of his family, was still a gentleman of 'the very first house.'"

I have quoted this note because the editor, perhaps from want of space omitted to record a fact mentioned in Silver's book regarding Signior Rocco's "Colledge," which is equally interesting with the anecdotes he has given, and for which I am indebted to a highly accomplished scholar and friend:—"He caused to be fairely drawne and set round about his schoole all the noblemen's and gentlemen's armes that were his scholers, and hanging right under their armes their rapiers, daggers, gloves of male, and gantlets. Also, he had benches and stooles, the roomth very large, for gentlemen to sit round about his schoole to behold his teaching. * * * And because all things should be verie necessary for the noblemen and gentlemen, he had in his schoole a large square table, with a greate carpet done round with a verie broade rich fringe of gold, and alwaies standing upon it a verie faire standish covered with crimson velvet, with inke, pens, pen dust, and quiers of verie excellent fine paper gilded, readie for the noblemen and gentlemen upon occasions, being then desirous to follow their fight, to send their men to dispatch their businesse. And to know how the time passed he had in one corner of his schoole a clocke with a verie faire large dial. He had within that schoole a roome which was called a Privie-schoole, for noblemen and gentlemen, where he did teach his schollers his secret fight, after he had perfectly taught them their rules. He was verie much beloved in the Court."

NOTES.

Lord Nelson.—In an illustrated copy of Dr. Dibdin's "Ædes Althorpianæ," in my possession, and once belonging to a celebrated bibliomaniac, are the following poems in manuscript. The first was written by the late Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire, so remarkable for her rare beauty, and so popularly known for her enthusiastic admiration for the political principles of Fox; and the second by her husband the Duke. The originals—for the present are copies obtained, it would seem, by special favour—were presented by her Grace to the late Marquis of Lansdowne. After much research and inquiry I have not discovered that they have ever been printed. They are quite worthy of "Memorabilia," not only as compositions, but as literary curiosities:

Nelson, by valour led to dauntless fame,
All toil surmounted, and all foes o'ercame;
Braved every danger calm and undismay'd,
While some new triumphs mark'd each step he made.
The force of France his ardent mind defied:
He conquer'd—knew it—bless'd his God—and died!
Britannia, glorying in her hero's fame,
On her victorious shield inscribes his name;
Grateful proclaims the safety which he gave,
But, midst her triumphs, weeps upon his grave.

Oft had Britannia sought, midst dire alarms,
Divine protection from her sons in arms;
Generous and brave, yet not from vices free,
Britain received from heaven a mixed decree
To crown their merit, but to check their pride,
God gave them victory—but Nelson died!

The Duchess died within a very short time after the Battle of Trafalgar.—George Daniel, Canonbury.

Runic Inscription.—In the Holy Island, off Lamlash, Arran, there is an excavation in the sandstone rock which goes by the name of the "Hermit's Cave," from one of the Culdees, named Saint Molios (pronounced by the islanders Molees), having made it his habitation, whose grave is still shown on the Island of Arran. A spring of pure water runs into a small pool opposite the cave, which is known by the name of the "Hermit's Well," and was long resorted to by the islanders as a specific for various ailments; they were wont to deposit offerings to the saint near the spot. It is evident that the cave was originally sheltered by overhanging oaks, from the ancient roots entwined round the outside; which is an interesting fact, as there is now nothing of the kind growing near the spot. It would therefore seem, as was frequently the case, that the hermit has taken the place of the Druids, who were wont to make the oak an object of reverence. A large St. Andrew's cross is carved on the rock above the cave, and an inscription in Runic character is still preserved on one of the sides of the cave, but it will soon be obliterated, from the number of Smiths, Browns, and Joneses, who wish to immortalise themselves.—H. T.

Shakespeare and Aristotle.—In your "Memorabilia," I find the following in a "note" by Lex on the above subject:—"I much doubt whether there was any English translation (of the Ethics) good or bad in the poet's time." On referring to "Clarke's Bibliographical Miscellany," vol. ii., I find there was a translation of the Ethics as early as 1547. The full title of the work is this:—"The Ethiques of Aristotle, that is to saye, Preceptes of good Behavioure, and perfighte honestie, now newly translated into English. Translated out of the Italian by Jhon Wylkinson, 16mo, Lond. 1547." The Politics had also been translated in 1598; and the Metaphysics in 1601. How the passage from the Ethics is translated by the above Jhon Wylkinson, I have no means of knowing; perhaps some of your readers may be able to determine the question. As Shakespeare does mention Aristotle's Ethics in one of his plays, though I forget which, it is just possible that he may have seen the translation referred to.

QUERIES.

Old French Proverb.—Can you tell me the signification of a saying sometimes met with in old French books:—Monter sur l'arse?—M.P., Boodle's.

[It was applied metaphorically to a bankrupt, because there was an ancient custom in France which compelled every bankrupt to ride backward on an ass through the town where he dwelt, holding the tail of the animal as a bridle.]

Tobacco and other Smoking.—A controversy is raging on the subject of tobacco-smoking. I wish to know if any of your numerable readers can inform me, what our ancestors were in the habit of smoking before the introduction of this, according to Mr. Solly, pernicious plant? Herb-smoking, there is good reason for believing, was prevalent in this country long previous to the importation of tobacco. A Whiff-ler, Temple.

Can any of your readers inform me the derivation of Ulnesmote? Mote, of course, is the Scandinavian for a meeting. The place where this Ulnesmote (whatever it signifies) was held is now corrupted into Woolmote, and since that by the ignorant into Woolmoor.—Enbeacum, Ugthorpe Lodge, Whitby.

A Candle to Discover the Dead.—On crossing St. Patrick's Bridge, in the city of Cork, on the evening of Friday, the 20th of March, there was a curious sight: One hundred persons, or more, were collected, and peered intently upon the water from bridge and quay. In the river there was a float or cradle of straw about four or five feet in length, and in the centre, protected from the wind by a wall of straw around, burned a candle. Upon inquiring it appeared that a child was drowned on the preceding day, and as the body could not be found, this plan of discovery was tried. Divers little boys assured the spectators who were incredulous that when this straw floated over the body of the child, it would, notwithstanding wind or tide, remain stationary, and the flame of the candle expire. Can any of your readers inform me how this superstitious custom originated, containing, as it probably does, the light of truth amid a shadow?—E. W. J., Cork Barracks.

Forthcoming Life and Correspondence of Dr. Doyle.—I have been for some time engaged in preparing for publication a Memoir of the Life and Times of the late Dr. Doyle, whose remarkable writings, both under his own signature and that of "J. K. L.," excited so wide a sensation and influence some thirty years ago. I possess a considerable quantity of his papers and correspondence; but, as the latter was exceedingly varied and extensive, I am quite sure much exists in many a home which the Illustrated London News contributes to brighten. I would be glad to receive either the original autographs or verbatim copies. If intrusted with the former, I pledge myself to return them promptly and carefully. Some of the most respected men in Great Britain have already aided the work. I shall acknowledge my obligation to them in my preface; to do so now might appear premature. William John Fitz-Patrick, Kilmacud Manor, Stillorgan, county Dublin.

Ancient MSS. from Lett. of Em. Per. from the Bod., 1, 278.—"An antiquary who travelled through Malmesbury many years after the dissolution of the Monastery, relates that he saw broken windows patched up with remnants of the most valuable MSS. on vellum, and that the bakers had not even then consumed the stores they had accumulated, in heating their ovens." Can any of your Correspondents inform me if any such MSS. have been discovered within the present century, in houses or cottages near the site of any monastery?—J. R. Fowal, Monkton Farleigh.

Enigma.—The Noblest Object in the Works of Art.—It strikes me that your Correspondent has quoted the above enigma from memory, and that he has accidentally misplaced one of the stanzas. If you make what is now the fourth become the second stanza, and leave the others to follow as they now appear, I think the following ten words would answer respectively each line, viz.:—Harmony, Eternity, Lark, Integrity, Olive, Payment, Obeisance, Luna, Introvert, Seed. The first letters of these words form the name "Heliopolis." In Heliopolis, the Oxford of Old Egypt, stood the great Temple of the Sun. Here the beautiful and the wise studied love and logic 4000 years ago. Here Joseph married the fair Asenath. Here Plato and Herodotus pursued philosophy and history; and here the darkness that veiled the great sacrifice on Calvary was observed by a heathen astronomer, Dionysius, the Areopagite. Here also is the garden of Metariah, where grew the celebrated Balm of Gilead, presented by the Queen of Sheba to Solomon, and brought to Egypt by Cleopatra. But of all the gorgeous beauties of this ancient city nothing now remains save a magnificent obelisk encircled by a small garden of orange-trees. Sic transit gloria mundi.—W. J. J.

When was the First Pantomime Performed in England?—In answer to "Mars's" inquiry, desiring information as to the date of the first pantomime performed in England, I beg to place at his disposal the following interesting paragraph supplying the required fact. It is one of many hundred similar cuttings from a set of newspaper files covering the period from 1790 to 1824. No cyclopædia that I possess furnishes any dates relative to pantomimes; they merely profess to describe the character of the performance:—

"Pantomimes.—The first pantomime in England was produced at Drury Lane, in the year 1702, in an entertainment called the Tavern Bilkers. It lingered only five nights. Its author, however (Weaver, a dancing-master at Shrewsbury), brought out another in 1716, called the Loves of Mars and Venus, which met with great success. On this occasion Steele wrote the following lines on the back of one of the playbills at Button's Coffee-house:

'Weaver, corrupter of this present age,
Who first taught silent sins upon the stage.'"

Steele's distich is not, strictly speaking, correct. The pantomimes of antiquity, not altogether remarkable for their moral tendency, usually expressed in gesture whatever the chorus sung.—William John Fitzpatrick, Dublin.

Englishmen with Women's Christian Names.—I see by your Journal of the 21st ult., in answer to Correspondents, that my esteemed friend Mr. Cooper, R.A., has pointed out several instances in which illustrious personages of late centuries gratified their love of Christian names of women, but as it may be interesting to some of your readers to know whence originated such a custom, I will here observe that it is a very ancient one. The early Christians were in the habit of taking, in baptism and confirmation, the names of those Saints to whom they had a particular devotion; and even amongst Roman Catholics of the present day such a course is not unfrequently pursued, especially on the Continent, where not only the men take the Christian names of female Saints, but the opposite sex vice versâ. In conclusion, it may not be out of place to remark that, those entering upon conventual and monastical life enjoy the same privilege in the selection of a beatified patron or patroness.—R. Villiers Sankey.

And, after some time, the game was abandoned as a drawn battle.

(a) Better, perhaps, to have taken with the Pawn.

(b) Black have now a very bad game, their pieces are much confined, and, unless by some carelessness on the part of White, it is not easy to see how they can be liberated.

(c) Useless, we believe, to the move tempting sortie of Q to her 6th.

(d) This looks precipitate. White had a certain game by keeping their opponent's forces locked up until both Rooks could be brought to bear; but this move enables them to free their men, though at some cost.

(e) Threatening to win the exchange by B to K R 4th.

(f) A fine-looking move, certainly; but would not K to K sq have been better?

(g) The best move.

(h) The spectators thought Q takes Q, followed by B to K B 4th, would have ensured the victory. We are not confident.

(i) Well played, indeed. After this it is difficult to see how to prevent Black making a drawn battle.

Novel Variation in the Game of Chess.—(To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.) Sir,—A strange thought has come into my head, the effect of which would be to introduce an entirely new series of openings in chess. Do not scoff pompatically, but rather think that this notice may be postponed one day; but the idea is the simplest possible, being merely to reverse the positions of the Knights and the Bishops. Thus the powers of combination remain precisely as before, but nobody knows how many new and unexpected developments might arise. The King's Bishop's Pawn would then become the King's Knight's Pawn, and would have to be moved to his 3rd square almost immediately, since that new undefended line of the Bishop's or Queen's attack would be immediately defensible by the King's Bishop from the Knight's (present) square. I cannot help thinking that much amusement might be derived from taking up this variation in the position of these two pieces. At present an accomplished Chess-player knows exactly every move, both in attack and defence, of every opening. This, of course, gives the first portion of every game a routine character. Analysis by successive writers has almost arrived at demonstration. It never has, and never will, quite reach that point; but to be able to start afresh from the very beginning into a new series of combinations seems to offer a very tempting prospect, and open out a new field for thought. The merit of such a variation seems to be that it may be attempted in play without the slightest perplexity, since in the course of a few moves the pieces fall into their natural positions, only they get there by a new process. Do give the subject a little thought, and ventilate it amongst a few players.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully, R. March 31.

The Northern and Midland Counties Chess Association.—In consequence of the great attraction offered by the Art-Treasure Exhibition, the friends of Chess have thought it desirable that this year's meeting of the Chess Association should be held in Manchester. The Birmingham Committee having kindly given a conditional assent to this proposition. There is every probability of an Exhibition of Manuscripts taking place in Birmingham next year, as well as the Triennial Musical Festival, and this may be adduced as an additional reason for the change.

THE PLAGUE SPOTS OF GREAT CITIES.

THE Report drawn up by Dr. Letheby, the Medical Officer of Health to the City of London, and read by the author to the Commissioners of Sewers, is stated to have "greatly astonished" those who heard it. We have no doubt of the fact. The printed report will create quite much astonishment in the wide circles to which the broad sheets of the press have already borne it. Good easy-going people will hold up their hands in innocent wonder and bewilderment, and—after asking themselves "if such things can be" in a civilised, humane, and Christian country—in the first city of the first nation in the world—will relapse into their usual quiescence, resign themselves to their share of the penalty, if any there be, and oppose the vis inertiæ of apathetic indifference to any attempt that more zealous and enthusiastic persons may make to remedy a state of things so deplorable and disgraceful. So it has ever been, and so it ever will be, until the earnest and enthusiastic men get the upper hand, as they sometimes do. Then, but not till then, the good, easy-going people, finding the work more than half done, will lend themselves to its completion. Fortunately in this country there is always a sufficient number of such advanced spirits to keep the popular mind moving, and to drag the majority after them, painfully and slowly it may be, but steadily and surely.

In all the great cities of Europe the plague-spots of Beggary, Vice, and Crime exist with more or less intensity. Wherever these three congregate, there also, as a necessary consequence are to be found, sitting with them cheek by jowl, or pigging with them in their straw beds, Filth, Squalor, Fever, and all manner of complications. London, Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dublin, and other large towns in the cities of the British Isles, are, perhaps, not worse in these respects than Paris, Marseilles, and Lyons, Vienna and Hamburg, and the other great cities of the Continent. But our present purpose is with London, and what Dr. Letheby says of it.

No small amount of physical and moral courage is required in the man who shall make such a personal inquiry as Dr. Letheby has made into the haunts and habits of the poor; but the detective policeman, the missionary of religion, and the physician venture into places where none other will set their feet, and see things of which others are but vaguely aware. In the eastern district of the city of London, which it should be remembered is only one of the many plague-spots of the metropolis, Dr. Letheby within the last three months visited 2208 rooms inhabited by the poorest of the poor; not only beggars, vagrants, and thieves, but unfortunate creatures out of work, and creatures almost equally unfortunate, having work, but being insufficiently paid for it. In 1849 of these 2208 rooms, the remaining nineteen being temporarily uninhabited, he found 5791 inmates belonging to 1576 families. To say nothing of the comparatively moral, but injurious and indecent, overcrowding of husband, wife, and four or five children in one small dark room, and one miserable bed, Dr. Letheby found numerous instances where adults of both sexes belonging to different families were lodged in the same room, "regardless of all the common decencies of life, and where from three to five adults, men and women, besides a train of children, are accustomed to herd together like brute beasts or savages, where all the offices of nature are performed in the most public and offensive manner, and where every human instinct of propriety and decency is smothered." "Like my predecessor," continues Dr. Letheby, "I have seen grown persons of both sexes sleeping in common with their parents, brothers and sisters and cousins and even the casual acquaintance of a day's tramp, occupying the same bed of ruby rags or straw; a woman suffering in travail, in the midst of males and females of different families that tenant the same room—where birth and death go hand-in-hand—where the child but nearly born, the parent cast down with fever, and the corpse waiting for interment, have no separation from each other, or from the rest of the inmates." Dr. Letheby declares that such cases are not exceptional, but common, and that he could cite others of more extreme debasement. In a fever-sick, called Rose alley, near Houndsditch, in a row of twelve houses, all in a shockingly dirty and ruinous condition, he found seventy six rooms, let for 1s. 3d. to 1s. 9d. each per week. These rooms were inhabited by sixty-three families of 252 persons; and in one particular room he found the lodgers to consist of one man, two women, and two children, in addition to a clay-cold tenant, whose immortal spirit had fled to its account—the body of a young girl, who had died in childbirth a few days before his visit, and which lay stretched out on the bare floor without shroud or coffin. As everybody might predict, except that great congregation of bodies and souls, the City, the Government, the Public, Society,—or whatever other name may be given to the human power that is responsible to God and man for the continuance of such horrors,—this place is the constant hive, haunt, and nursery ground of infectious diseases, plagues, and fevers. About six weeks previous to Dr. Letheby's visit, as he was informed by the medical attendant of the poor in the vicinity, a fever passed from room to room through all the tenants of Rose-alley, and attacked almost all the adult males. So close and unwholesome was the atmosphere that Dr. Letheby "endeavoured to ascertain by chemical means whether it did not contain some peculiar product of decomposition that gave it its foul odour, and its rare powers of engendering disease. He found that it was not only deficient of oxygen, but that it contained three times the usual amount of carbonic acid, besides a quantity of aqueous vapour, charged with alkaline matter, that stunk abominably, the product of putrefaction, and of various fetid and stagnant exhalations."

Where is the remedy? It is not only the danger to the physical health of the community that calls for some action on the part of Society to stay the plague, but, to use the eloquent words of Dr. Letheby, "the yet deadlier presence that stalks side by side with the pestilence, blighting the moral existence of a rising population, rendering their hearts hopeless, their acts ruthless and incessions, and scattering, with Society averts her eye, the retributive seeds of increase for crime, turbulence, and pauperism." Society cannot do much,—however much it may try to improve the moral condition of the adults who live in this worse than barbarism. He or she who has lived to the age of thirty or forty in dirt and squalor, loves dirt and squalor. It is easier to teach an adult the alphabet—and any one who has made the attempt knows how difficult this is—than to teach a man or woman who has lived this life of the beasts the decencies of civilisation, the comforts of cleanliness, and the value of pure air and wholesome sunshine. Pleasant as personal purity is to the pure, personal filth is to the filthy; and the effective remedy must be commenced with the children, that they may be taught the laws of their own health, and their physical and moral, as well as intellectual and religious, duties. But this is a long and laborious process; and, though it may do something for the improvement of the next generation, leaves the present generation uncared for. It is not sufficient—though Dr. Letheby suggests no other remedy—to enforce the registration of common lodging-houses, and control, through the officers of health, the numbers and condition of the inmates. Nine-tenths, or perhaps nineteen-twentieths of the existing lodging-houses for the poor, instead of being placed under control and supervision, ought, in American parlance, to be "reformed off the face of the earth." But of course this cannot be done until other dwellings are provided; and the great question arises, who is to provide them? Clearly it is not the owners of the existing hovels and sties, who derive from them a larger return on the capital embarked than the proprietors of the princely tenements of Belgrave and Tyburnia. Were the metropolis of Great Britain united under one municipal government, with sufficient powers, the remedy might be more easy; and dwellings for the poor might be provided on the same principle on which Society or Government in its abstract character provides highways and bridges and other matters of public convenience. We have nothing to say against the increase of churches, which, in every variety of architectural beauty, are springing up in all parts of this mighty metropolis; but we do think that the great cause of Religion would be served, and that these churches would be filled with a greater proportion of devout listeners, if, contemporaneously with such temples for the worship of God, there arose in every parish a sufficient number of decent and comfortable dwellings, where Cleanliness,—which the Scriptures teach us is next to Godliness,—and all the virtues that follow in its train, might be instilled into the affections and into the habits of that large portion of the population which now perishes, both physically and religiously, for want of some one to help it. In a money-loving age it is not, perhaps, the least of the recommendations of such projects for improving the dwellings of the poor that the speculation would pay. London owes an example to the rest of the world in this respect. It will be better that London should give it as the ornament of dwellings for the poor than as the victim of a plague brought upon it by its own apathy. Perhaps, however, Society requires the stimulus of a plague before it will bestir itself? If so, there is more than enough in Dr. Letheby's Report to prove that the stimulus, disagreeable though it be, is by no means improbable.

THE NEW JUNIOR UNITED SERVICE CLUB-HOUSE.

THE HALL AND STAIRCASE.

IN the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for Sept. 27, 1856, we engraved the exterior of this handsome new mansion, showing the Charles-street and Regent-street fronts. We now engrave the most striking portion of the interior—the Hall and Staircase.

The chaste and elegant Hall agrees in style with the general character of the whole building, being Italian in its proportions and details. Its height, 32 feet, length, from the principal entrance to the distant Post (seen in our view), 51 feet, and the Breadth 21 feet. The ceiling is divided into nine panels, the centre in diameter of which is enriched. The nine ceiling panels are decorated with a central flower, from each of which is suspended a globose lamp of gilt brass, divided into two parts, and subdivided into eight divisions. There are two doors on each side of the hall one on each side being blank. Between the doors are panels, in recess, each having circle and oval moulding, that on the right of which is seen in our engraving, is set with plate-glass mirror, the view of the latter showing the opposite side each as finished with looking-glass, which forms the Hall and gives a pleasing effect. At the back of the hall is the grand staircase.

The staircase is supported by a series of pillars, and is of stone, and, supplies an elegant and imposing entrance to the principal rooms of the establishment. The steps are 12 feet wide, and have a moulded nosing, and are finished with a plain soffit. The balustrade is of stone, and is formed in a light flower, resembling the Greek honeysuckle pattern. The number of steps to reach the first landing is about twenty four, and past the turn of the stairs is a pair of pedestals, upon each of which are placed two caryatides, standing females, and holding in each hand a palm branch. From each feature above the heads of these figures spring three arches, the centre rising to the height of the large staircase, the other two upon the side staircases, which lead to the library, drawing-rooms, and billiard-rooms. Of the latter there are two—one for the use of smokers—which may also be approached by a separate staircase from the smoking-room below. The whole of the hall is of Caen stone, as well as the staircase and balusters. Over the doors there are sculptured panels, bearing shields surrounded by foliage. The caryatides on the staircase are by Mr. J. Thomas, as are also the whole of the sculptured enrichments. The stained glass is by Ballantyne, of Edinburgh. The architects are Messrs. Nelson and Innes; and the clerk of the works is Mr. Haste, who has ably carried out his duties.

We must not omit to mention that Sir William Allan's picture of "The Battle of Waterloo" hangs on the wall between the doors leading to the reception-room, and forms an object of great and appropriate interest.

THE WAR IN CHINA.

The Moniteur de la Flotte publishes some further details relative to the war in China

The Chinese, it is said, are at present making formidable military preparations, which are not to be despised. Since the attack on Canton the Chinese have executed enormous works on the Pei-ho, a river which falls into the Yellow Sea, and by which a communication is maintained with Pekin. That river is now barred in twenty-five different places by dams built of stone, which completely intercept the navigation. These works are regarded as a curiosity. Moreover, the three branches of the Pei-ho, canalised by the Emperor Kien-Lung in 1747, cross it, and the course of one of them, the Hu-ho, has been turned off into the Lake of Kao-pin-tsi. When an army invades the Chinese empire the principal means of defence is to let the waters of this lake overflow the country. This system of defence effections against an enemy, but most disastrous for the country was first used against the insurgents in 1852. The city of Pekin is consequently perfectly safe from an attack either by land or sea, and the Emperor will in any like deplorable circumstance be protected by the fanaticism of the people, who will stop at no means to destroy foreigners. A circumstance has lately demonstrated the truth of this fact. The British ships proceeding to Canton it has been in the custom of taking fresh water at Woosung from a small river which falls into the Hoang-pou. It was remarked that the sailors using the water daily have been attacked with cholera, and after a careful investigation it was discovered that the water was poisoned by the Chinese. They emptied the putrescent carcasses of certain fowls, which after being putrefied for the occasion, impart a deadly poison to the water. The Chinese are naturally malignant, and their wicked genius is stimulated by the Tartar scum, which is hostile to Europeans. There is but one way to subdue them, and that is to act on their senses, and to terrify them by a display of force and by a maritime demonstration on a grand scale. Such is the opinion, we are told, held by the British Government. It appears that some of the wealthiest merchants in the empire propose to revive the great commercial company founded in 1759 by Young Chin. These great capitalists, though personal interest, are highly favourable to an arrangement with the English, notwithstanding their warlike manifestations, and at this moment in direct communication with the members of the New Hoo or Cohong Council, at Pekin, they can bring their influence to bear directly on the Emperor's advisers. The revival of the company founded in 1759 would render it impossible for the Chinese Government to violate at will its treaties with foreigners.

The Moniteur de la Flotte concludes that an arrangement of the difficulties at present existing between the Chinese and English is perfectly possible. For this purpose the British Government have merely to adopt the only means efficacious with the Chinese character, that is to make a formidable demonstration on the coast of the Chinese empire.

The Times of Wednesday last states that Lord Elgin will be entrusted with full powers by the British Government, and that the following are the conditions now demanded by the latter —

1. The renewal of the amount to pay, which is to affect eight ports of China, instead of five, English vessels are, moreover, to be permitted to take refuge on any points of the coast in case of storms &c

2. England shall possess, like Russia, a college at Pekin. The superior of this establishment, which is to consist of at least five members, shall enter into official relations with the Chinese Government.

3. England shall possess military posts in all towns where she may possess consuls or agents. Ground shall be given to England at Shanghai which shall be fixed on by the two Governments.

In addition to these conditions others of minor importance will be demanded.

SPAIN, MEXICO, THE UNITED STATES.

Private letters from Madrid, of the 10th inst., state that Lord Howden, in concert with the Marquis do Turgot, is doing all in his power to prevent hostilities from breaking out between Spain and Mexico. As from the latest and surest information, it is ascertained that there is a plan of the United States to make a diversion in Cuba in the event of war. It is right to state also that M. Pidal the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs, evinces great anxiety to come to an arrangement, and that he is perfectly moderate in his views and language on the difficulty, however, which the English and French Ministers—who have recently had such a thankless Mexican Ambassador here—will have to encounter in Paris, will not proceed from M. Marcoleta himself, but from the Spanish being received locally, and presented to the Court as one accredited to a country where her subjects have been murdered without any real punishment being yet inflicted for these sanguinary acts.

THE DANUBIAN PRINCIPALITIES

Accounts from Bucharest state that on the 4th inst a deputation of the chief proprietors, who class and several young boyards of higher station presented to the Consuls here of the Four great Powers on the occasion an address was presented to Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer in which the Roumans expressed their firm hope that his presence on the ground would powerfully contribute to deliver them from all restraint, and thereby secure to them an undoubted manifestation of the wishes of the country, with entire independence in the elections. They reminded him that at the Congress of Paris the Representative of her Britannic Majesty was the first to testify much zeal in the necessity of taking measures to meet the just wishes of the Roumanian people and from what Power could they expect that desired redress with more assurance than from that one which has had the happy privilege of enjoying for ages the benefits of free institutions."

The following reply was made by the English Commissioner:—

Gentlemen,—I have listened attentively to the words which you have just addressed to me, and my first duty is to think you for all the obliging sentiments you have expressed towards my country, my government, and myself. With regard to the question to which you particularly call my attention—namely, the elections which are shortly to take place, the Ottoman Government has declared in definitive in the most solemn and precise manner, and arriving direct from Constantinople. I am happy to say that the Sublime Porte desires with sincerity what it has declared without hesitation. I must also believe that the Government of this Principality, at the head of which is placed a Prince whose talents, one of the illustrations of your annals, and who from his position, as well as from his character, and his well-known attachment to the institutions, is the guarantee that the elections which are about to take place will be conducted in the most regular manner. Nothing will be permitted to disturb in any circumstance so moral a step; they are called upon to exercise the rights which are granted to you by the Treaty of Paris, and I believe on the part an Englishman, proud of his country, and who has accorded to his country every liberty which is the object of your legitimate aspirations, I have a right to say that I am sure that the elections will terminate in the most regular manner, and that you will be able to enjoy without restraint the advantages which may either result from the will of the majority or contrary to the spirit which has dictated the Treaty of Paris on your part, gentlemen, you have to contribute that I will second good intentions to the zeal and well-directed efforts of my colleagues.

THE UNITED STATES

The Royal mail steam-ship Africa, which left New York on the 1st of April arrived at Liverpool on sunday last.

The most striking news from Washington announces that the Hon. Robert J. Walker and the Hon. Judah P. Benjamin, of Tennessee had respectively accepted the appointments of Governor and Secretary of Kansas territory. Mr Walker would not proceed to the scene of his future labors for some weeks. The Washington correspondent of the New York Herald says that Mr. Buchanan has laid down a programme which everything must tend which is that the Missouri compromise of the whole people must have expression in order that the will of the majority of the inhabitants of the territory shall rule in the adoption of a State Government or not. Mr. Buchanan professes to feel no influence as to whether Kansas becomes a free or Slave State

The Chinese dispute is also exciting comment in The Union Intelligencer says that Ladies better purposing to have been received by Lord Napier from England, announcing the policy intended to be adopted towards China The American merchants, it is said, do not wish that England shall obtain commercial advantages in China which they do not possess, and therefore they wish their own Government to take an active part in the coercive measures in its own account Another account says the thing is certain, that the United States Government will enter into no tripartite alliance with England and France; and in the Administration have not already informed Lord Napier and Count Sartiges of this determination. They will shortly go out.

The New York Herald says that, notwithstanding the assertions to the contrary, Mr Buchanan has materially changed the Dallas-Clarendon treaty from the form it had assumed in the Senate. His object has been to make it conform as nearly as possible to the American interpretation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and at the same time to exclude all pretence of sovereignty or protectorship on the part of England. With this view all ambiguous language has been struck out."

It is rumoured at New Orleans that an expedition is fitting out there for some point in Central America. It is supposed to be in addition to make the first demonstration on Veragua, a province of New Granada, between Costa Rica and Panama. It is said that the expedition is friendly to General Walker, and that it is to act in concert with him It is also reported that a personal Government has been formed, and that considerable funds have been raised

THE FILIBUSTERS IN NICARAGUA.

The intelligence from Nicaragua by the last mail shows that the total ruin of Walker is rapidly approaching. A fate worse than defeat has overtaken him, he is besieged in Granada, and is reduced to famine for him to attempt to cut his way to the sea. Their position by the unspeakable folly of his military executions of those who were taken in the attempt to cut their way to the south from Granada. By the last accounts received it was stated the men had become so disgusted with the brutality, drunkenness and insolence of the officers, and Walker's gross neglect of the sick and wounded, that in an attack on San Jorge they refused to advance. After this incident they began to leave the encampment at Rivas with their arms and accoutrements, and to come in small parties, and absolutely to refuse to shoot them if they interfered. On the 24th of February 150 went over to the Costa Ricans and surrender. They were treated well by the allies, clothed and fed, and received a free passport to the United States. They had arrived by a steamer at Panama, some of them came on to New York by the Illinois, others were about to leave for New Orleans By the last departure about seventy of them signed an address to their fellow-soldiers still remaining with Walker, describing the treatment they had received and the favorable terms kept with them, and they urged their comrades to abandon the Americans as soon as possible. This he had deceived them from the first in point of entering into the service." A large number of the recruits from New York were entirely ignorant of the country and its condition, and actually thought they were going as settlers all the warnings of the New York press were useless in this respect. A paper supposed to have been written by a number of Americans, as soon as they arrived they were induced to leave Walker and join the enemy as Walker had found a few days sufficient to open their eyes and end their enthusiasm for him. Walker has lost nearly one half of the remnant of his army since they came into action to the United States well, to judge by the accounts they have published, he has no armies of the most effective kind against him. In the mean time the native chiefs were closing him in at Rivas. It was supposed they would not make an attack on place but would starve it out, as his communication with the lake, the river, and the Atlantic were quite cut off and all provisions had ceased.

The Government of the Central American Republics have prepared to enter into an arrangement with respect to Nicaragua that will have the effect of expunging that State from the map; in fact, a partition of Nicaragua is resolved on, that State itself being an assenting party. Commissioners representing Costa Rica, Nicaragua Guatemala, Honduras, and San Salvador are to meet at San Juan del Sur (on Salvador) to draw up the terms of a settlement of the country, by which Nicaragua is to be divided among and annexed to the other States. Costa Rica will take the territory on both sides the San Juan river, and that between the lake and the Pacific, as far north as Massaya, this is one of the first of Walker's recent series of disasters. Chontales was given to Honduras. The remainder falls to the share of San Salvador. This settlement, it is stated, is proposed by Nicaragua itself which despairs of maintaining peace in the country by any other means. It is to continue for a certain number of years, not yet fixed, but not specified, after which the people may resume their independent position if they choose. This country is the transit route, for which a war was fed by rival steam-boat companies, into the hands of the rulers of Costa Rica, who also hold the captured steamers, and have altogether a very good vantage ground for "negotiation" with the new parties, who, it is understood, wish to re-establish the traffic.

THE NEUFCHATEL QUESTION.—A letter from Berlin in the Elberfeld Gazette says:—"The Conference of Neufchâtel still remains suspended in consequence of the resistance of Switzerland to the Prussian claims. Count de Hatzfeld and Dr. Kern have both referred matters to their Governments, and the Swiss Envoy has demanded fresh instructions. It is said that the majority of the Great Powers have advised Switzerland to adopt a more conciliatory attitude towards Prussia.

PRUSSIA AND SWITZERLAND.—By a decree signed by the Prussian Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Finance, dated December 30, the exportation of horses across the frontiers, in every direction, is prohibited until further orders. The new levy amounts to 14,000 men. A service of vigorous surveillance has been organised on the frontier. A proclamation by the Federal Council is expected.

DISTURBANCES IN THE ROMAN STATES. Intelligence from Italy and Marseilles states that some disturbances have broken out at Bologna and Viterbo, the pretext being the payment of taxes, but were put down. Energetic measures, it is said, have been taken to prevent a recurrence of such scenes.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES CONVENTION.—The Moniteur of 8 instant publishes an Imperial decree, promulgating the convention which was concluded on the 14th of January between Count de Persigny on behalf of the French Government, and the Earl of Clarendon with Mr Labouchere on the part of the Government of Great Britain, for the regulation of the Newfoundland fisheries.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LORD DOUGLAS.

THE RIGHT HON. AND REV. JAMES DOUGLAS, fourth Baron Douglas, of Douglas in the county of Lanark, Hereditary Sheriff of Clydesdale, died on the 6th inst., at his seat, Bothwell Castle, Lanarkshire. His Lordship was the fourth son of Archibald, first Baron Douglas and his second son by his second marriage with the Lady Frances Scott, posthumous daughter of Francis, Earl of Dalkeith, and sister of Henry, third Duke of Buccleuch. He was born the 19th of July, 1787. Early in life he went into Holy Orders. He married, the 18th May, 1814, Wilhelmina, second daughter of the eminent General, the Hon. James Murray, by whom he has left no issue. His Lordship succeeded his brother Charles, the third Baron, on the 10th September, 1848. By his demise the title becomes extinct; but the estates of the family, once the subject of vast litigation, devolve upon his Lordship's sister, the Right Hon. Jane Margaret, Lady Montagu, widow of Henry James, Lord Montagu of Boughton. This peerage of Douglas, which thus passes from the roll of existing noblesse, was the result of the famous suit known as "the Douglas cause," which may be briefly told as follows:—Archibald Stewart, afterwards the first Lord Douglas, and the father of the Peer just deceased, was the only surviving son of Sir John Stewart, Bart., by his wife, Lady Jane Douglas, only daughter of James, second Marquis of Douglas. This Archibald Stewart assumed the demise of Archibald, Duke of Douglas, without issue, the 21st July, 1761, when the Dukedom expired, was returned heir of line and provision to that nobleman; but the Duke of Hamilton, who had inherited his Grace's Marquisate of Douglas, disputed his return, on the ground that Archibald Stewart's birth was surreptitious, he being born clandestinely, on the 10th July, 1748, in the house of one Madame Le Brun, in the Faubourg St. Germain, Paris, and his mother being then in her fifty-first year. The Scotch courts determined in favour of the Hamilton claim, but an appeal was made to the House of Lords, which reversed the Scotch judgment, on the 27th Feb. 1769. A full account of this interesting and most extraordinary trial, which made at the time a noise all over Europe, appears in a recent work, "The Romance of the Forum." The successful litigant, Archibald Stewart, having thus become entitled to the estates, assumed the surname and arms of Douglas, and was elevated to the Peerage, as Baron Douglas, of Lichlee Castle, the 9th July, 1790. He died the 20th Dec. 1827. Three of his sons in succession inherited his honours. The last of these, the subject of this notice, ends, by his death without issue, a prominent branch of that historic and brilliant family, the Douglas, for centuries the mightiest in Scotland, whose very origin is so remote that it is lost in the mists of antiquity.

SIR C. W. TAYLOR, BART.

SIR CHARLES WILLIAM TAYLOR, Bart., of Hollycombe, Sussex, was the son of Peter Taylor, Esq., of Barrett House, Somersetshire, M.P. in 1774 for Portsmouth. He was born the 25th April, 1770. He himself represented in Parliament the city of Wells for thirty-four successive years, and he was created a Baronet the 21st Jan., 1828. He had married, in 1808, Charlotte, second daughter of John Paulett Thompson, Esq., of Rochampton and Waverley Abbey, Surrey, and sister of Lord Sydenham, by which lady (who died the 1st June, 1848) he leaves one son, Charles, his successor, and one daughter, Emily-Frances, now the wife of Lord Brougham's only surviving brother, William Brougham, Esq. Sir Charles Taylor died at his seat, Hallycombe, in Sussex, on the 10th inst. He is succeeded by his only son, now Sir Charles Taylor, the second Baronet, who was born in January, 1817.

WILLIAM MAULEVERER, ESQ.

THIS gentleman, who died at his residence, Arncliffe Hall, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, on the 26th ult., in the sixty-ninth year of his age, was the second son of Clotworthy Gowan, Esq., by his wife, Anne, daughter of Thomas Mauleverer, Esq., of Arncliffe Hall. He succeeded, by devise from his aunt, Miss Mary Mauleverer, in 1833, to the estate of Arncliffe; and, in compliance with her testamentary injunctions, assumed the name and arms of Mauleverer. He had previously taken an active part on the Liberal side in politics, and was an unsuccessful candidate for the borough of South Shields in the Parliament convened after the passing of the Reform Bill. On that occasion the inhabitants presented to him a diamond ring as a mark of their esteem. A body of electors of the North Riding of the county of York invited him, in 1835, to become a candidate for that district; and a deputation of the voters of Northallerton also solicited him to offer himself for that borough. He always felt a warm interest in the county affairs of Northallerton; indeed, his decease was partly owing to the excitement of addressing the electors of Northallerton in behalf of the present member, Mr. Wrightson, on the 13th ult. Mr. Mauleverer was earnestly attached to general purposes, and kept the greater portion of his estate in his own occupation. He was an active magistrate. He married, in 1812, Helen, daughter of Sir George Abercromby Bart., of Forglen House, chief of the clan Abercromby, by whom (who survives him) he leaves two daughters, Jane and Georgina-Helen. The elder of these ladies was married, the 21st September, 1841, to Thomas Meynell, Esq., of the Fryerage, near Yarm, and of North Kilvington Hall, near Thirsk; for many years Chairman of the Stockton and Darlington Railway. Georgina-Helen, the younger of Mr. Mauleverer's daughters, is the wife of Douglas Brown, Esq., barrister-at-law, of the Norfolk Circuit. This branch of the Mauleverer family is of great antiquity in Yorkshire: a full account of it appears in Whitaker's "History of Leeds" and Graves's "History of Cleveland." The founder, Sir Richard Mauleverer, came into England with William the Conqueror, who made him Master of the Forests, Chases, and Parks north of the Trent. The estate of Arncliffe, acquired by marriage, has been enjoyed since 1420 by the Mauleverers. It had been held by tenure of service in the twelfth century by Robert Ingram had, in the 26th Henry III (1242), a grant of free warren in Hesleriton Dale and Arncliffe. The original grant is still preserved at Arncliffe Hall.

SIR GEORGE WILLIAM ANDERSON, K.C.B.

SIR GEORGE WILLIAM ANDERSON, a distinguished East Indian Civil Servant and Colonial Governor, was the son of Robert Anderson, Esq., a London merchant, and was born in London in 1791. He was educated at Haileybury College, and entered the Civil Service of the East India Company, on the Bombay establishment, in 1806. He became assistant to the Accountant-General in 1809, and was Registrar to the Court of Adawlut for some years; he filled after that several judicial offices, and, when Commissioner of Justice in the Deccan, in 1827, he repeatedly received the thanks of the local and home Governments; he was made Collector and Political Agent in the south Mahratta country, in 1831, and was successively Senior Judge of the Sudder Dewanee, Indian Law Commissioner, Member of Council, and Chief Judge of the Sadder Adawlut, to which high office he was appointed in 1835. In 1841 he was Governor of Bombay; in 1849, Governor of the Mauritius; and, in 1850, Governor of Ceylon, from which latter office he had not long retired. He was created a Knight Bachelor in 1849, and a K.C.B very recently. Sir George William Anderson who was twice married, died on the 17th ult., at his house, 99, Westbourne-terrace.

WILLIAM LESLIE, ESQ., OF WARTHILL, ABERDEENSHIRE,

THIS venerable and highly-respected country gentleman, the tenth Laird of Warthill, died on the 13th ult., at the advanced age of eight six. For the long period of just sixty years, during which he was in possession of his patrimonial estate Mr. Leslie resided almost constantly upon it, devoting himself to its duties as a landed proprietor, and taking a warm interest in the progress of improvement in his native country, and the social condition of its people. Mr. Leslie was among the first of those who recognised in Scotland the value and importance of the ameliorations of late years in agriculture, and, from his great knowledge and experience, he was considered one of the best authorities on agricultural subjects in the northern counties. Mr. Leslie's information was curious and extensive, and those interested in antiquarian matters and statistical returns have often derived from him much valuable assistance. He had been for upwards of half a century a magistrate and Deputy Lieutenant of Aberdeenshire. He was the representative of a branch of the ancient and distinguished family of Leslie, of which the Earl of Rothes is the chief, and which descends from Bartholomew de Leslaus, who in the middle of the eleventh century settled in Aberdeenshire, having obtained from King Malcolm Canmor large grants of land in the north of Scotland.

Mr. Leslie, the subject of this notice, was the twenty-second in direct lineal descent from the above Bartholomew, and was the tenth proprietor of the estate of Warthill, which was acquired by one of his ancestors, in 1437. Mr. Leslie married, in 1813, Jane, third daughter of the Rev. Patrick Davidson, D.D., of Rayne, Aberdeenshire, and niece of Sir Walter Farquhar, Bart., and leaves by that lady, who survives him, five sons and two daughters: the eldest of the sons, William, born the 16th of March, 1814, succeeds his father in the family estates; the elder daughter, Mary Anne, is the wife of Dr. Patrick Duncan, the Younger, Professor of Civil Law in King's College and University of Aberdeen. Of this family of Leslie was the famous William Leslie, Professor of Theology in the University of Padua, Metropolitan Bishop of Carniola, and a Prince of the Empire, who died in 1727. He was the second son of William Leslie, fifth laird of Warthill.

VICE-PROVOST BETHELL.

THE REV. GEORGE BETHELL, M.A., Senior Fellow and Vice-Provost of Eton College, and Rector of Worplesdon, near Guildford, died at Eton College on the 16th ult. Mr. Bethell was the fourth son of the Rev. R. Bethell, M.A., by his wife, Ann, daughter of James Cuthbertson, Esq., of Beeston-house, Middlesex; and was the younger brother of Richard Bethell, Esq., of Rise, and Walton Abbey, Yorkshire; of Christopher Bethell, D.D., Bishop of Bangor; and of the late James Bethell, Esq., of Brighton. He was born in 1795, elected scholar of King's College, Cambridge, third of his year, in 1797, Fellow of King's, 1800, and graduated B.A. in 1802, M.A. 1805. He was for many years Assistant Master of Eton, and was elected Fellow of the College, the 21st Sept., 1813, and subsequently Vice-Provost. Eton College presented him, in 1823, to the vicarage of Burnham with Boveney, Bucks, which he resigned, in 1833, for the more lucrative living of Worplesdon, in the same patronage. The rev. gentleman married Miss Ann Lightfoot, and by her, who died some four years ago, he leaves a family to mourn his loss. The Attorney-General, Sir Richard Bethell, is a scion of this family of Bethell.

THE REV. H. R. DAWE, OF DITCHEAT MANOR.

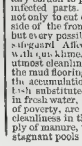
THE REV. HILL REDLAND DAWE, whose death occurred rather suddenly on the 10th ult., was the representative of an old Somersetshire family of that name, which has been settled at Ditcheat Manor-house, near Castle Carey, co. Somerset, since 1670, in which year the family acquired the Ditcheat Manor estates, by purchase from the coheiresses of the celebrated Royalist General, Sir Ralph (afterwards Lord) Hopton. The Rev. Mr. Dawe, who was the son of Andrew Moore Dawe, Esq., of the 73rd Foot, by Anne, daughter of Richard Hare, Esq., of Bath, was born in 1810, and succeeded his uncle, the late Hill Dawe, Esq., J.P., as lord of the manor of Ditcheat, in 1851. The rev. gentleman was a fellow-commoner of Magdalene College, Cambridge; and was Chaplain to the West Somerset Regiment of Yeomanry Cavalry. By his death, unmarried, the Ditcheat Manor and estates pass under the will of his late uncle (Hill Dawe, Esq.) to Major Charles Dawe, of Weymouth, late of the 46th Foot, who married Sophia, daughter of the Rev. William Leir, Rector of Ditcheat, and has a family.



WILLS AND CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.—Probate of the will of the Right Hon. the Earl of Ellesmere has just been granted by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury.—Lieut.-General Nathaniel Thorn, £25,000 personalty, and has left several charitable bequests. George Jones, Esq., of Shackerley, £120,000, and has bequeathed £1000 to the South Staffordshire Hospital.—Lady Brown, of Chester, £500 within the Province of Canterbury.—Mrs. Sophia Cuthbert, of Berkeley-square, £200.—James Lyon, Esq., of Clapham-rise, £12,000, and has left bequests to several charitable institutions.—The late Mrs. Jane Davies, of Clapham, has left the following bequests:—Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, £200; for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, £200; National Benevolent, £200; Deaf and Dumb, £200; St. Ann's School, £200; Sons of the Clergy, £200; Zion College, £200; Blind Asylum, £200; Orphan Asylum, Clapham, £200; Church Building, £100; Homeless Poor, £100; Shipwrecked Mariners, £100; Life-boat Fund, £100.

THE CATTLE PESTILENCE.—According to the dates of the 6th from Pest, the cattle pestilence has broken out at the Russian village of Bruntzkaburun, close to the Prussian frontier, near Conitz. The murrain has also shown itself in two or three other hamlets where it never appeared hitherto. The Government functionaries and veterinary surgeons have been sent to the spot, and close attention paid by the military cordon to prevent communication even with the persons coming from infected parts. No precautions have been spared by the Government, not only to cut off communications with localities on the other or on this side of the frontier, wherever or what way the disease has shown itself, but every possible measure, has been put in force for the safety of property not deposit. Affected beasts are slaughtered forthwith and carefully buried with quicklime. Cattle-sheds are white-washed and fumigated and the utmost cleanliness enforced. It is also recommended and insisted on that the mud floorings or pavements in cattle-sheds or stalls shall be taken up, the accumulation of ammonia or earth removed, and fresh sand or rubbish substituted. The latter process, and clearances of drains by pouring in fresh water, is speedily urged. But the border peasantry, independent of poverty, are essentially filthy in their habits, and, moreover, regard cleanliness in their cattle-sheds or hog-sties as a diminution of the supply of manure, which they are accustomed to accumulate in heaps, or in stagnant pools before their doors.

EN ROUTE FOR CHINA.

SKETCHES FROM OUR OWN ARTIST AND CORRESPONDENT.

WE have received the following communication from the Artist and Correspondent whom we have dispatched to the localities of the War with China. The incidents described and illustrated in these letters present pictures of our traveller's experiences at Marseilles and Malta—by no means barren places to the artist and the lover of the picturesque.

MALTA, Saturday, March 14.

Old Marseilles is now far away to the north: but it is a lively place, I think, though it has been so abused. That fierce "Mistral" (as the cutting, dry northwester is called) is certainly a drawback to out-of-door pleasure while it lasts. It almost cuts a fellow in two, and raises such clouds of dust that it nearly blinds you; but its duration is not long—at most nine days. We have sufficiently abused the Mistral, and will now see what is agreeable in the town. The day of my arrival was a regular Provençal one—not a cloud in the sky, and the Mediterranean looking beautifully blue. I rushed to an hotel, white with dust, and, having taken a room paved with tiles (small red ones) after the southern manner of flooring, I immediately proceeded to book my place on board the Valetta, Captain Roberts. Got a capital berth, No. 1, which I shared with a Major Dillon (30th), who likewise had taken his even later than I had mine, while those who had taken theirs in London got the worst places. I then strolled about the Cannibière, and, finding it very cold, I went into a café. The cafés are much finer than those of Paris, and they always bring you an entire bottle of brandy, trusting you to tell them how much you have imbibed, which practice does them great credit. Having stayed there some time, I walked home to the port. Early next morning, having breakfasted, I strolled up to the Notre Dame de la Garde, which looks over the town, and saw one of the finest sights in this part of the world. It, to my mind, is far more beautiful than the view of Genoa from the hills. Marseilles lay at my feet; its red-tiled houses and white dusty streets glittering in the southern sun. Then, beyond that, lay the Château d'If (so celebrated in "Monte Christo"), in the bluest of seas. The only vegetation was olive-trees, cypresses, aloes, pines, and a few peach-trees in full blossom, notwithstanding the frost. Having feasted my eyes on this scene, I descended. I then went to the port; bought a red sash; looked at the groups of people wandering about here a group of Catalans, in snuff-coloured jackets and pantaloons to match, with red caps; there some cutthroat-looking Greeks. Then the girls, sitting on their baskets waiting for some heavy load that they carry on their heads: they are Genoese, and do the work of porters—not light porters by any means, for I saw one carry such a load of coal as would frighten a coalheaver.

Next day we got on board at the new port of la Jolliette, and, having taken in our complement of passengers and luggage, we started next morning. Came in sight of Corsica and Sardinia; passed through the Straits of Bonifacio. The Island of Sardinia looked most barren, but picturesque. We have plenty of officers on board for Bombay To-day we had a hailstorm off Sicily, but it soon cleared. Passed Marsala. Saw it distinctly through the glass. It seems a splendid place. We are now in sight of Gozo Light, and will soon be in Malta: this is splendid; we have at length got into warm weather.

March 17.

Saint Patrick's Day was kept with due honour; and never was a jollier party assembled than was ours. In the daytime we had drawn lots for the vans; my lot was to be in the fifth. We form into parties of six. I have sketched the event likewise our smoking-club: the gentleman in sailor's costume is the doctor. The tall, handsome man talking to him is a Major, who commanded the Bashi-bazouks in Bulgaria. The rest are Majors and Captains bound for Bombay. The sketch has been highly approved of by all the officers and sailors, and has created much merriment; especially the lots for the vans, as the last van gets all the dust from the others.

ALEXANDRIA, March 18.

I believe I left off when we were in sight of Malta. Well, we soon arrived at Quarantine Harbour, having sent up three rockets to let the coons know who was coming; but they made no answer, so we steamed in; the watery-looking old moon shed a dubious light on Valetta, whose outline appeared sufficiently picturesque. Queen Adelaide's Church was the most prominent feature, being so entirely out of keeping with the Oriental-looking houses of the town. Stepping into one of the odd-looking boats with all manner of things (such as eyes and flags) painted on them, we arrived at the landing-place; paid the boatmen, and rushed up the steps, stumbling over the prostrate forms of something in sacks; which, on nearer inspection, proved to be natives, with limited incomes, and with great ideas of the necessity of ventilation, who were thus taking an al fresco sleep. Leaving the gentlemen to enjoy their slumbers, and thinking how much better off they were than the picture I saw of an English casual ward, we mounted steps innumerable; the passengers of the Indus, from Southampton, were waking the natives with their native airs of glorious memory, the "Ratcatcher's Daughter," in the still and starry night of the balmy South; what could I do but respond in thrilling tones that woke up the echoes, "Polly, won't you try me, oh?" but seeing a crusher (policeman) at the corner of certain B 27—I became mute, and proceeded to rouse up my brother, whom I found ensconced behind some musquito curtains; and, having made him dress, we went to the Imperial, in the Strada Sante Lucia, and ordered beds and supper. In the supper-room two of the Persians from Paris were seated, smoking cigarettes, and looked mightily picturesque. My brother rattled away in Maltese, much to my amusement. "Shem?" (how are you?) he asked of everybody, and was answered by "tahib" (all right), "iva" (yes), "leh" (no), and so on. I like the Maltese; they are deuced jolly fellows, and wonderfully picturesque: the faldetta (black silk mantilla) that they wear always out of doors is elegant, and looked very becoming. An open door looks on to the square courtyard, where in the centre are some tropical plants, and around the court some benches. Each bed-room looks on to an arcade that runs round the court, so that, opening your bed-room door, you have the full enjoyment of the air without the rain coming into your room. The English furniture, the English carpets, the Maltese stone floor and paperless room produce a strange effect; but it is the same all about the town; it is the first thing that strikes you in fact; it is a regular half-and-half town—the most foreign of all foreign-looking houses, with its covered balcony and flat stone roof; perhaps a dark-eyed native in her feldetta at the door. The street is narrow, admitting a subdued light—you are enchanted, when to your horror who should come up but A 21 in traditional costume, minus the hat, for your Maltese crusher wears an oilskin cap, and luxuriant beard and moustache. Your poetry instantly vanishes, you rush to Pisani's, buy a gigantic Maltese cigar in sheer despair, and console yourself with coffee and cognac, turn in at an early hour, vowing never to be romantic again. You get up at daybreak, go and take your coffee and bread at the Commercia, with its beautiful vaulted ceiling. You then rush into St. John's (mighty nate); see some natives on their knees; you rush out again, followed by sundry red and blue capped fellows, desiring to make you acquainted with the curiosities, minus a gratification—"See the town, sare?" You decline their polite attention by saying in Maltese, "Murmino" (you bother me). You step up the Strada Reale to the Barracca in front of the Auberge de Castile—you enter the Barracca. No smoking allowed—you extinguish your cigar. A fair-haired son of Albion, in a red coat, and with phlegmatic features, is pacing up and down with his bayonet in hand, amid gigantic aloes and Indian figs; you look down upon the old harbour, with its men-of-war, its ships, and steamers; below you is a garden with orange-trees loaded with fruit, and two cypress-trees; swallows are flying about in the warm air; to the left is the town of Valetta and Quarantine Harbour. In the distance the Mediterranean sometimes deep blue, sometimes bright green, sometimes neutral, and sometimes black—according to the weather. The sky is a light blue; and great clouds—the remains of last night's rain—are dispersing rapidly. The glare is not much—the houses and fortifications not being white, as everybody has described them, but of a subdued brown, the shutters green. Having observed all this, we descend the muddy streets—a beautiful cream-coloured mud; we look at the Governor's palace; we purchase what we want till we get to Alexandria; take a look at the Post-office, and go to the market; the guttural Arabic strikes the ear; semiclothed natives, some in sandals, all with bare necks and sashes, are selling oranges, Indian figs, &c. We are surprised to see the town filled with goats; but, on inquiry, find they take the place of cows, and supply milk. We see the 42th Highlanders marching to church: the bells fill the air, music is heard, military bands strike up. Maltese in shirt-sleeves, sitting at their doors, pay no attention to the India-going travellers, with their white veils à la turban round their wideawakes. No; they (the natives) are in groups, in the most picturesque attitudes, smoking and talking. I made a great impression on a pretty, dark-eyed beggarwoman by giving her sixpence: she wished a "buon viaggio" with the sweetest of smiles.

We got on board, and, at 9½ a.m., steamed off: a native in trousers in a boat offered to take a dive, and a Major having thrown in a shilling, the fellow dived down and came up with it in his mouth. We soon left Malta far behind: overtook the Indus. Our captain's greatest delight is racing with the steamers he meets. He is never beaten, and the Indus is now far abaft and out of sight. We breakfast at nine a.m., a bell rings at half-past eight to warn us, but early in the morning some of the early risers come on deck in equivocal costume, without stockings, in their slippers, and, standing on the paddle-box, take an airing and a pipe. We have the liveliest set of fellows in the world going to Bombay. After breakfast, which is first rate, we lie about in dolce far niente attitudes, and smoke pipes and tell a sedotes; then read or do anything we fancy. At twelve, tiffin—various viands and biscuits. Then all the ladies may be seen lying full length in arm-chairs that pull out, or on deck, and gentlemen in shooting-jackets, caps, or turbaned wideawakes in every attitude, under the awning on the forecastle—most are asleep. At four p.m. dinner—vast, copious, and plentiful. After dinner we smoke again till seven, the sun in the mean time having set, and the stars come out in all their glory, when not cloudy. At seven tea, and then on deck till nine p.m.; when grog in all shapes, cards, and conundrums, roars of laughter, good temper, and jollity reign on deck; again a few songs, and at ten o'clock turn in. Such is our life on this side. Last night we formed into parties of six for the vans.

THE MORMONS—KANYON IN THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS.

AMONG the news received of late from the deluded followers of the Mormons is the painful intelligence of the death of many hundreds of our poor countrymen who have been foolish enough to leave England for Utah. The Mormon leaders, while professing to be inspired, and to be under the immediate guidance of God, with the power to work miracles, and ability to surmount every spiritual and physical ill, have, nevertheless, been ignorant and reckless enough to send their followers so late from the Missouri river to go to Utah, that winter set in long before they reached their place of destination, and, overtaken by cold and snow, without sufficient food and clothing, they became frostbitten, and died by hundreds.

The illustration upon the preceding page, which has been engraved from the sketch-book of a recent traveller, represents the scene of those disasters, with a train of Mormonite followers. The country is rocky, and the roads wind along the foot of the hills. The ravines, or "kanyons" as they are termed, are difficult to travel, though even in summer and in winter they are generally impassable, even by the hardiest mountaineers. Sad, then, must have been the condition of the Mormon women and the delicate children, hundreds of whom were without waggons, or any other means of transport than hand-carts. These hand-cart companies were taken in by waggons sent from the valley; but, according to the late accounts, there were about 400 emigrants still in the country of the Snake Indians.

By the most recent intelligence from New York it appears that the Mormons at Utah have broken out into open rebellion. In January last a party of Mormons of high standing in the Church, under the advice of Brigham Young, broke into the offices of the United States' District Judge and Clerk of the Supreme Court, and carried away by force all the papers and books belonging to the Supreme Court. The reason they gave for this outrage was, that Congress would not admit them as a State, and that they did not intend to tolerate any United States' offices in the territory.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1857.

THE auspicious addition of a Prince or Princess to the Royal family of Great Britain, though no longer to be considered a novel or unusual event, always excites the warmest feelings of respect and loyalty. At such times, and while forming prayers for the continued health of her Majesty, and for the increased happiness of her domestic circle, the people intuitively bethink themselves of those private and public virtues by the exercise of which Queen Victoria has added grace and dignity, as well as strength and stability, to the throne. Such considerations are never out of place, but there are occasions on which they are more obviously appropriate and natural than at others. Whenever they occur they cause reflective minds to be grateful that their lot has been cast at a time when none of the great and often exasperating questions which are always arising for discussion in a free and progressive country has been complicated and embittered by the personal unpopularity of the Sovereign. Those who have studied the events of the last half-century and who do not think it necessary to show the wisdom of their loyalty to the present occupant of the throne by the unwisdom of their loyalty to the memory of all her predecessors, near or remote, are those who feel most grateful that England is not at this moment governed by a man like George III., or, still worse, by one like George IV., and that it escaped the heavy trials through which it would, in all human probability, have been doomed to pass if Ernest, Duke of Cumberland, had succeeded to the throne instead of her present Majesty. The prevalence of a blind and slavish loyalty, irrespective of the personal character of the Sovereign, bespeaks a nation unworthy of freedom; but loyalty founded upon the practice by the Monarch of all the domestic virtues, upon the graceful performance of public duties, and upon undeviating adherence to constitutional practice, is like the quality of mercy, and blesses both the giver and the receiver. Fierce political tempests have passed over Europe since the accession of the present Queen; and if England happily escaped their influence—though some portion of the praise may be due to the sturdy common sense of the people, and to their long experience in the art of self-government—no small portion is due, also, to the exalted lady who, in an age of Republican tendencies, knew how to make Royalty popular, and endear it to the heart as well as the judgment of the nation. In all other countries where Royalty is strong it is only made strong by force of bayonets; and, if the bayonets should fail, the edifice, imposing and durable as it looks, would speedily topple to the ground. There it would lie, until a new man with a greater number of bayonets should be found to set it up again. Fortunately for the British Crown—and more fortunately still for the British people—no such aids are required in this country. The Throne is based on reason and liberty, as well as on affection. These make it the securest Throne in the world; and such considerations add fervour to the prayers offered by the people for the health and happiness of the present Sovereign, and to the cordial sympathy in all the events, both public and private, of a reign that has hitherto been so auspicious.

TITLES of nobility, if not based upon high public function, or upon the claims of ancient descent and large private fortune, are neither ornaments nor aids to the State. In Germany, Italy, and many other countries, where, if a Baron or a Count has seven or a dozen sons, each son is a Baron or a Count as much as his father, and where each of them may in his turn transmit his title to all his descendants, however numerous, a title is by no means a distinction. One English Peerage is worth a whole wilderness of such barren baronies. In Russia such titles are of really no more worth than the honorary distinction of Esquire in this country, which very few people assume, but which everybody expects to be called. Two English mechanics went to Russia in the days of the Emperor Paul, and both had the good fortune to please that Monarch. In testimony of his good will he offered to give them their choice, either of the title of Prince or of a warm fur coat. One chose the title and the other the coat. The man of the title met the man of the coat a few months afterwards, and bitterly expressed his regret that he had not chosen the more comfortable and substantial gift of the two. Things are not quite so bad as this in France, but they are bad enough to have alarmed the Emperor, who naturally wishes to surround and strengthen his throne by a respectable aristocracy. Real Barons who will clean your boots or run a message, or real Counts who will act as markers at a billiard-table, for adequate fee and reward, are bad enough, but sham Barons and Counts are, if possible, even worse; for in the first case the world may pity the evil fortune that has led to the degradation, while in the latter case it must despise the empty vanity of the assumption, or punish it, if it be a cloak, as it often is, for deception and robbery. A Report on this subject which has just been addressed to the Emperor Napoleon, by M. Abbatucci, recommends the revival of penal laws against the assumption of titles of nobility, and bases the recommendation on some very curious disclosures of the aspects of modern French society. No doubt M. Abbatucci is right when he brands such assumptions as offences against public morality; but it is a question which admits of very considerable doubt whether they be offences against which the terrors of the law ought to be invoked. He who without intention of robbery or swindling assumes a title to which he has no claim is punished by the contempt of all honourable and well-disposed people. That is punishment sufficient. He who assumes a false title for the purposes of dishonesty ought, if convicted of dishonesty, to receive an additional amount of punishment for the false pretence by which the dishonesty was wholly or in part accomplished. But the important question in France is not so much the punishment of false as the creation of a true nobility. The great Revolution destroyed the last vestiges of the ancient aristocracy of France, by depriving of fortune, and consequently of position, the inheritors of the great historic names. But even now these simple and unadorned names are in themselves greater and higher titles than any in the power of a King or an Emperor to confer. Plain M. De la Rochefoucauld, M. De Talleyrand, or M. De Grammont is a rank infinitely more noble than would be any that could be conferred upon a M. De Morny, a M. Fould, a M. Pereire, or a M. Mirès. An aristocracy no more than an oak is to be grown in a day; and it is the misfortune of France, as well as of the present régime, that the old aristocracy, which dates its origin from the depths of the middle ages, is both too poor and too stupid to lend either strength or dignity to the institutions of the country. The world laughs at the Dukedoms and Marquisates conferred by the Emperor Soulouque on his sable subjects. It will not laugh at the Imperial titles that may be conferred by the Emperor Napoleon, if such titles should represent genius, courage, and patriotism in their possessors. But in this matter, as in most others, it is far easier to destroy than to create. The French Government may put down and punish, as it wishes to do, the false assumption of nobility; but will it succeed either in conciliating the old or establishing a new Aristocracy? We think not. We think, too, that the greatest result of the weeding of titles which M. Abbattucci recommends will be the giving of a factitious value to the old and legitimate titles already in existence—titles unaccompanied either by wealth, by political status, or by beneficial influence on the minds and affections of the people. Better no aristocracy at all than an idle, powerless, pauper, but recognised aristocracy of the tea-table. Better, too, than this the aristocracy of military rank, which has the merit of being a reality, and which we much fear is the only aristocracy which the Emperor Napoleon can hope to establish.

THE COURT.

ACCOUCHEMENT OF HER MAJESTY

The interesting event to which the nation has been anxiously looking forward occurred on Tuesday last, on which day, at a quarter before two o clock, the Queen was happily delivered of a Princess.

There were present on the occasion in her Majesty's room his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Dr. Locock, Dr. Snow, and Mrs. Lilly, the monthly nurse. In the adjoining apartments, besides the other medical attendants (Sir James Clark and Dr. Ferguson), were the Mistress of the Robes, the Lady in Waiting on the Queen, and the following officers of State and Lords of the Privy Council viz., his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the Lord Chancellor, Viscount Palmerston, Sir George Grey, the Earl of Clarendon, Mr. Secretary Labouchere, Lord Panmure, Sir Charles Wood, the Bishop of London, and the Marquis of Breadalbane.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, accompanied by the Princess Hohenlohe-Langenburg, arrived at the Palace shortly before two o'clock.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert went, about four o'clock, to the Privy Council-office, and was present at a Committee of Privy Council (the other Lords present being the Lord Chancellor, Viscount Palmerston, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Sir George Grey, Mr. Secretary Labouchere, Lord Panmure, the Bishop of London, Sir Charles Wood, the Right Hon. M. T. Baines, and the Marquis of Breadalbane).

At the Council a prayer and thanksgiving was ordered for the safe delivery of the Queen, to be used next Sunday (to-morrow) during Divine service.

The Turkish Ambassador and Madame Musurus, the French Ambassador and Countess Persigny, the Bavarian Minister and Baroness de Cetto, the Prussian Minister, the Saxon Minister, the Austrian Minister and Countess Appony, the Russian Minister, and other members of the diplomatic corps, called at Buckingham Palace, where the following bulletin was exhibited Buckingham Palace, April 14, 1857, 3 p.m.

The Queen was safely delivered of a Princess this afternoon, at forty-five minutes past one o'clock.

Her Majesty and the infant Princess are well. JAMES CLARK, M.D.
CHARLES LOCOCK, M.D.
ROBERT FERGUSON, M.D.

Many of the nobility and gentry also called to pay their respects during the afternoon. The joyful intelligence was made known to London during the afternoon by the firing of the Park and Tower guns; and after the assembly of the Privy Council an extraordinary edition of the London Gazette was issued, in which the announcement was made, coupled with this gratifying addition:

"Her Majesty and the infant Princess are, God be praised, both doing well."

On Wednesday the following bulletin of the health of the Queen was issued —

Buckingham Palace, April 15, 1857, 9 a.m.

The Queen passed an excellent night
Her Majesty and the infant Princess are going on favourably.
JAMES CLARK, M.D.
CHARLES LOCOCK, M.D.
ROBERT FERGUSON, M.D.

On Thursday the following was exhibited:—

Buckingham Palace, April 16, 9 a.m.

The Queen has slept well.
Her Majesty and the infant Princess are going on quite favourably.
JAMES CLARK, M.D.
CHARLES LOCOCK, M.D.
ROBERT FERGUSON, M.D.

Intelligence of the happy event was telegraphed on Tuesday from the French Embassy to the Emperor Napoleon, who replied by the same medium, and desired that inquiries should be made twice daily at Buckingham Palace in the name of his Imperial Majesty.

Lord Cremorne has succeeded the Earl of Caithness as Lord in Waiting to her Majesty.

The Duchess of Kent has been suffering from slight indisposition for some time past. We are happy to learn that her Royal Highness's usual good health is nearly re-established.

His Royal Highness the Duke de Nemours visited the Duchess of Kent on Wednesday.

Their Royal Highnesses the Hereditary Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, and their youthful son, are expected to arrive in this country in the course of next month, on a visit to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge.

His Excellency the Ambassador of France and the Countess de Persigny left town on Thursday, for Paris.

Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston left town on Wednesday for Broadlands, Hants.

PRAYER AND THANKSGIVING FOR THE BIRTH OF A PRINCESS

A Form of Prayer and Thanksgiving to Almighty God for the safe Delivery of the Queen, and the Happy Birth of a Princess. To be used at Morning and Evening service, after the General Thanksgiving, in all Churches and Chapels in England and Wales, and in the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, upon Sunday, the 19th day of April instant, or the Sunday after the respective Ministers of such Churches and Chapels shall receive the same ALMIGHTY and merciful God, by whose providence the whole world is governed and preserved, we yield Thee hearty thanks that it hath pleased Thee to deliver Thy servant our Sovereign Lady the Queen from the perils of childbirth, and to make her a joyful mother. We humbly beseech Thee to keep her under Thy fatherly care and protection; and to enable her in the hour of weakness to feel the support of Thine everlasting arm. Defend the infant Princess from all dangers which may happen to the body, and from all evil which may assault and harm the soul; and grant that as she grows in years she may grow in grace and in every Christian virtue. Let Thy continual help preserve our Queen and her Royal consort; that, Thou being their ruler and guide, they may so pass through things temporal that they finally lose not the things eternal.

And grant, O Lord, that Thy continued goodness to our land may so affect the hearts of us Thy people, that we may manifest our thankfulness by ready obedience to Thy will, by due allegiance to our Sovereign, and by Christian charity one towards another; that so living in the faith of Thy dear Son, who loved us and gave himself for us, we may be indeed a holy nation, a peculiar people, and show forth Thy praise, who hast called us to Thy kingdom and glory. Grant this, O heavenly Father, for Jesus Christ's sake, our blessed Lord and Saviour. Amen.

NEW SPIRITUAL PEER.—Dr. Bickersteth, the recently-appointed Bishop of Ripon, will take his seat in the House of Lords immediately after the consecration of Mr. Pelham to the Bishopric of Norwich. Until Dr. Bickersteth's introduction Dr. Baring (Gloucester and Bristol) will take all the duties of Junior Bishop.

ELECTION OF SCOTTISH REPRESENTATIVE PEERS.—The election of sixteen Peers to represent Scotland in the Upper House of Parliament took place on Tuesday last within the ancient picture-gallery of Holyrood Palace, in presence of a crowded and brilliant assemblage of about 1600 persons. The principal clerks of session officiated as the returning officers in place of the Lord Clerk Register (Marquis of Dalhousie). Principal Lee and Professor R. Lee, of Edinburgh University, officiated as Deans of the Chapel Royal, and respectively opened and closed the meeting with prayer. The Lord Provost and magistrates of Edinburgh were present in terms of her Majesty's proclamation. The roll of the Peers of Scotland was called as it stood at the period of the Union, when the following Peers answered to their names: The Dukes of Atholl and Montrose; the Marquises of Tweeddale and Lothian; the Earls of Morton, Perth, Lauderdale, Mar and Kanes, Airlie, Leven and Melville, Kintore, Seafield; Viscount Strathallan; Lords Blantyre, Colville of Culross, Belhaven and Stenton, Rollo, Polwarth—in all, eighteen. Signed lists were given in from the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry, the Duke of Lennox (Richmond), the Earls of Crawford, Eglinton and Winton, Cassilis, Home, Haddington, Galloway, Dalhousie, Lords Saltoun, Gray, Cathcart, Elibank, Sinclair, Torphichen, and Forrester—in all, fifteen. Signed lists had also been sent in by the Earl of Orkney and Lord Somerville; but, not being accompanied with the usual signed oaths, could not be received. The Earl of Buchan, through Lord Morton, sent a proxy, which, for the same reason, was not available; and the Earls of Stair and Buchan sent in signed lists equally irregular. The oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration were taken by the peers present and afterwards subscribed. Their votes were then taken both viva voce and by signed lists. The result being that all those present voted for the same peers as represented Scotland in last Parliament—namely, the Marquis of Tweeddale, the Earls of Morton, Home, Strathmore, Airlie, Leven, Selkirk, Orkney, and Seafield; Viscount Strathallan; Lords Gray, Sinclair, Elphinstone, Colville of Culross, Blantyre, and Polwarth. All the peers sending signed lists voted for the same. Those peers were thereupon duly elected to serve in the ensuing Parliament.

THE SPEAKERSHIP.—Mr. Evelyn Denison, the candidate proposed by the Government for the office of Speaker, is the eldest son of the late John Denison, Esq., of Ossington, M.P. for Colchester. Mr. Evelyn Denison succeeded his father in the possession of large landed estates in the counties of Notts, Lincoln, and York, which had been bequeathed by an uncle, Mr. William Denison, an opulent merchant in the middle of the last century. Mr. Evelyn Denison was educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford. He was a Lord of the Admiralty in Mr. Canning's Administration. Since that time it is understood that he has declined offers of office both from Lord Grey and from Sir Robert Peel. Mr. E. Denison married Lady Charlotte Bentinck, third daughter of the late Duke of Portland. He is President of the R.E.A. Society, and was commissioned to represent the interests of agriculture at the Great Exhibition of Paris in 1855, and again last year at the International Agricultural Meeting. Mr. E. Denison moved the address to the Crown on the peace in the Session of last spring. His next brother was the late Bishop of Salisbury. The next surviving brother is Sir William, Governor of the Colony of New South Wales.

PRINCE ALFRED.—The following is contained in a letter from Coburg to the Kreuz Zeitung:—"According to our fundamental law, Prince Alfred of England is destined to succeed to the united Sovereignty of the Duchies of Coburg-Gotha. His Royal Highness is now in Switzerland, but, it appears, will arrive at Gotha on the 6th of May, and after a short sojourn there will come to this place and remain at the Ducal country mansion of Rosenau. He will subsequently remove to Bonn, where his father, Prince Albert, completed his studies." Whenever Prince Alfred succeeds to the throne of the two duchies, the reigning House of Coburg will gain a step in German hierarchy. At present the Sovereign is only entitled to the designation of Highness or Ducal Highness. Prince Alfred being, however, of immediate Royal descent, will retain for himself and assume for his heirs the title of "Royal Highness." This latter title is now restricted to the Elector of Hesse and to sovereign "Grand Dukes," such as Oldenburg, Baden, Hesse-Darmstadt, the two Mecklenburgs, and Weimar.

It was raining heavily on the day of the 9th, on the morning of the 11th, and on the night of the 14th. A dense fog lay about the Horizon on the morning of the 11th. A halo was visible round the moon at nine p.m. of the 9th, with an appearance of a mock moon at the upper part. A few vivid flashes of lightning were noticed between nine and eleven p.m. of the 12th.

The sky still remains much overcast, but was clear on the evenings of the 9th and 11th, and during the afternoons and nights of the 10th, 14th, and 15th.

The daily means are obtained from observations made at 6h 7m 10s, 10h, 2h, 6h, and 10h. p.m., on each day, except Sunday, when the first observation is omitted. The corrections for diurnal variation are taken from the tables of Mr. Glaisher. The "Dew-point" and "Relative Humidity" are calculated, from observations of the dry and wet bulb Thermometers, by Dr. Apjohn's formulæ and Dalton's Tables of the Tension of Vapour. The movement of the wind is given by a self-recording Robinson's Anemometer, the amount stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

A WEDDING IN RUSSIA.

DURING the stay of our Artist, Mr. R. T. Landells, in the neighbourhood of Moscow whither he had gone to sketch the splendid coronation scenes of last year—he had an opportunity of witnessing the picturesque ceremony of a Russian Wedding, which he accordingly sketched for our Journal. Accompanying are his recollections of the impressive scene.

The bride and bridegroom in a Russian wedding have so many parts to play that the wonder is they are able to get through the complicated ceremonies of the Greek Church correctly. The formula is not set forth in their prayer-books as the office of matrimony is in ours, and it is believed that no rehearsals are allowed.

The wedding here illustrated took place last summer, a few miles from Moscow. We were invited, with many other Englishmen, to assist at it, and, certainly, the scene was one altogether new to us. At the hour appointed we met at the residence of the bride, who, in her own apartment, was being decorated in her richest attire by her female friends and relatives; each having brought some small offering, and invoked with much earnestness the blessing and protection for her of their own favourite saint. Whilst this was going on here, similar proceedings were taking place at the bridegroom's abode, he being assisted on this, his last day of bachelorhood, by his particular friends, who all came to rejoice with him in his good fortune. When all was ready for proceeding to the church, the bride was enveloped in a large white veil by her mother, who, as well as her sobs and tears permitted her, blessed her darling child.

Upon entering the church, they were met by all their neighbours and friends, and at first sight it seemed a scene of confusion—kissings and congratulations going on amongst the younger and more heedless of the company, and prostrations and prayers before the images of the saints by the older portion. This at last was put an end to by the arrival of the priests, who as they entered the church presented a splendid and imposing picture. Their dresses of cloth of gold were richly embroidered; their long hair was parted in the middle, and fell down their shoulders in rich profusion. They approached the altar, and received there the happy couple. After a slight exordium to them upon the duties they were about to undertake, a small carpet of velvet with gold embroidery, presented to the church by the bride, was brought forth. Upon this the pair knelt: lighted candles (previously blessed) were placed in their hands, and the prayers were chanted by the priests in rich, deep voices—the people all bowing and crossing themselves incessantly; the rings were next blessed and exchanged, the priests still chanting. Then came the sacramental cup—the priests, bride, and groom alone partaking of it, which they did three times each person. To conclude the ceremony two crowns were produced, massive and heavy with gold and stones: in the front of each were portraits of "Mary, mother of God," and of St. Nicholas. These were proudly and with much reverence kissed by the young couple, and then handed over to the groom's man, who, during the remainder of the prayers, held them over the heads of bride and bridegroom. This was not difficult as long as the parties were kneeling or standing: but they were obliged to follow the happy couple round the church, they being led round by the priest, who had hold of both their hands, he all the time chanting a prayer in a fine deep voice. The effect of this part of the ceremony was somewhat marred by the bridegroom's extreme height, his attendant being rather short, so that most of the time he was on tiptoe, which, of course, detracted from his graceful appearance. In this way they made the tour of the church three times. When they had finished, the senior priest again reminded them of their duties; and, as soon as the bride and bridegroom had kissed all the images and holy relics of the church, the congratulations and kissings of the entire party were renewed most vigorously. On their return to their own home they were met at the door by their parents, who, with many prayers and blessings, offered them the bread and salt, which are significant of prosperity and happiness. The young couple repeatedly kissed the hands and feet of their parents, and thanked them for all their love and kindness. Wine was then drunk to the health of the newly-married couple, congratulations were repeated, and the evening was spent in festivity, in which the bride and bridegroom bore their part. The feasting lasted many days, and, as is always the case from the highest to the lowest, the newly-married pair were the principal actors. There is no running away to spend the honeymoon quietly, in some dreary, dull place, amidst strangers; but their first days of wedded life are passed amongst their relatives and friends, who endeavour with them to make the great event of their lives as happy as possible—a much more sensible and rational mode of proceeding, we imagine.

A fire broke out last week in the village of Epamnesnil (Somme), which burnt with such violence that fourteen houses, with all they contained, were speedily destroyed, and twenty-four families deprived of shelter

HER MAJESTY'S STEAM FRIGATE "FURIOUS" AND CONVOY OF GUN-BOATS FOR CHINA.

THE fleet of gun-boats now commissioning and fitting out for China have nearly completed their equipments, and will, in a few days be on the way to their destination. This fleet will be convoyed thereby her Majesty's steam-frigate Furious, 10 guns, commanded by Captain Shorland Osborn, C.B.; and the following vessels are among the number: The Niaard and Rosbuck, 6-horse power dispatch gun-boats, of 6 guns and 45-horse power; Surprise and Cormorant, second class dispatch gun-boats, of 4 guns and 200-horse power; and the first dispatch gun-boats Algerine, Lewes, Slaney, Jumna, Welksfield, Woolcock, and several others of this class of vessel, which are all of two guns and 60-horse power. These craft will be of the greatest service in the war we are at present engaged in, as we have no armed vessels in these or in the draught enough to follow the gun-boats, which cannot go where our ships so much, into the narrow and shallow inlets where they find pirates.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

NEWMARKET has opened its 1857 campaign with anything but that dashing list which marked the Craven week in olden times. Alfred Day whose toe has so completely recovered from the effects of his Lord Nelson concussion at Northampton that he wasted to 8st. 4lb., won the Craven Stakes on the speedy Darrow, who was forthwith claimed, for Lord Londesborough, at £200, and won £50 of it the Wednesday. The much-looked-for Mr. Merlenger was lame, and a sad lot to Bel Esperanza, on whom John Day had a winning mount for Sir R. Bulkeley. This jockey has given up training on his own account, and we trust he may have that success in the saddle to which his honesty and quiet careful riding so richly entitle him. Bartholomew did not ride during the week; and it is said that he has great difficulty, after his eight months' rest, in coming to the weight, and will hardly ride under 8st. 7lb. again. Scott's Derby lot are hopeless, and it is just doubtful whether he will bring any to the post for it. Beecham, who was said to have been favourably tried, was a wretched loser over Glenmasan had but little to do to beat one of the second in the Sale Stakes, and he nine a rather poorer favourite for the Derby than before; and Ayscomb placed a good stake to Lord Portsmouth's account in the Column. Her dam, Pocahontas, is barren this year to Melbourne, as is Castanette, the dam of Fandango, to Voltigeur, and Virago has a colt foal to Orlando. The reed Catherina, who is almost the only Whisker mare left, and was bought in at the Burleigh sale for 16 guineas, has had a Cossack foal in her 28th year. A good deal of dissatisfaction has been expressed by an address by the New York Spirit of the Times to Mr Ten Broeck, the guardian of the American horses at Houghton Down, exhorting him not to be the victim of such absurd English jockey notions as "waiting" when he runs his animals for the Ascot Cup, but to confer his rider to "go in and win, by forcing the pace from end to end. A sporting honour of our country," says this pundit, "is concerned, and should not be sacrificed by a trick, or a racing style, in which English jockeys are au fait." It is lucky for England that Fandango and Job Marson will be there, as her representatives, to bring this boastine, in all human probability, to nought. It is said that Fandango (9 st. 3 lb.) has had the better of Skirmisher, at 5 st. 13 lb., in a trial, and that he will represent the Zetland stable on Tuesday, in the Great Northern, at York; but he has not been backed for it as yet. Yellow Jack (8 st. 2 lb.), Chevalier d'Industrie (5 st. 11 lb.), St. Giles (6 st.), Commuter (5 st. 7 lb.), and Dulcamara (8 st. 10 lb.), are also in it; and we should not be surprised to see Lord Zetland beat Lord Ribblesdale the horse. At present the betting is very wild on this race while Voltaire is firm and Ivo thousand premiership, for which Mr. Merry's colt, brother Anton, is to be "coming." The Zetland Stakes has twenty-eight two olds—nearly all of them duds. Ignoramus, Sprig of Shillelagh, Scamperer, Apathy, and Gemma di Vergy are in the Spring St. Leger, for which we doubt whether the Melton stock will Apathy looks well for this, as well as the Biennial on Wednesday; where Augury, Wardermarke, Nougat, and Skedaddle are to win him. Milton takes Thursday and Friday, but the list is anything but of an interesting order. The Howden steeplechase three in number—come off on Monday and the Irish Militia on the same day, followed up by the Irish Gentlemen's Club on Thursday.

John Dory, who "schooled Ellington for the Derby" last year, is in the market, and so many hunters are now coming up from the provinces, Messrs. Tattersall announce sales for next Thursday, and will continue the practice through May. Twenty-five couple of the Hambledon hounds are for sale; and we hear that twenty couple have been purchased from Mr. Anstruther Thompson for the Southwold country. Dr. Chevasse's testimonial has been set on foot in earnest at last, by Mr. John Day, of Melton Mowbray and we trust that those who saw the veteran "go like distraction" in old days, or have only read of his deeds and his hairbreadth escapes through his well-known "Hunting Lecture" in the "Post and the Paddock," will join to give him a comfortable annuity. It would be a shame to neglect such an institution of the English hunting field in his 76th year. The murder of the Pyrgo Park vixen has been stoutly denounced both in prose and verse, and we can only account for it (if quite correct) in so good a sportsman as John Tredwell by the fact that huntsmen are often careless in this respect, when their master is giving up a country.

Beyond a few school matches on ground which has been sadly "dead" from the rain, there have as yet been no cricket matches of importance; and the London Model Yacht Club have their opening trip from Blackwall, at 3 p.m., on Saturday.

WE are requested to correct a misstatement which appeared in the Supplement of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of March 7th, to the effect that the late Mr Standish, of Duxbury Park, Lancashire, bequeathed his collection of pictures to H.M. Louis Philippe at the time of the French Revolution. It was not the late Mr Standish who made this bequest, but his predecessor, Frank Hall Standish, Esq.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE EASTER DINNER AT THE MANSION-HOUSE.—Pursuant to annual custom, the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor entertained on Monday evening a numerous and fashionable party more or less connected with the City of London, the chief of whom, with a large number of distinguished strangers, the most remarkable of whom was the young King of Oude and his retinue. His Highness was dressed in the utmost magnificence of Oriental costume, and with a lavish display of diamonds, the number and brilliancy of his diamonds. On the toast, "Their Highnesses the Princes of Oude," their Royal Highnesses the Princes of Oude had returned thanks, and said that their Highnesses the Princes of Oude had commissioned him to thank the Lord Mayor and the company for the manner in which their health had just been received. British but praise had done much for the civil-loads of India, but its action had been chiefly felt among the poorer classes. While the Prince and his retinue remained stationary. But these latter had at last around themselves and coming to them, "forces could themselves witness the mighty power of the British army, the indomitable energy and exhaustless resources of our commerce." They could see how the law was in this country above all things, and how all classes, from the Crown down to the peasant, bowed down before the majesty of that law. The greatness of England had been the subject of much speculation amongst the attendants; their Highnesses, and, to show the justness of their conclusions, he would only recite a little anecdote. One of these attendants asking another what could be the cause of England's greatness, the other said, "The reason is plain, the people all work and nothing goes to waste. The dry bones which we throw out to the dogs are converted to manure, and produce fresh food for man; and the rags which have served the beggar are made into paper, on which are written the laws with which this people govern the world." Loud cheers.

COMMENCEMENT OF EASTER TERM.—Wednesday last being the first day of Eastern Term, the Lord Chancellor entertained the Judges of the several Courts of Equity and Common Law to breakfast, at his mansion in Upper Brook-street, Grosvenor-square, and at the same time held his general levee of the Bar. Amongst those present were the Vice-Chancellor Sir W. P. Wood, Lord Campbell, the Vice-Chancellor Sir T. Kindersley, Lord Chief Baron Pollock, Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, Mr. Justice Crompton, the Lord Chief Justice, Sir A. The procession was headed by the Horse Guards, with their band and the beadles of Westminster. The Lord Chancellor, having taken his seat on the woolsack in the House of Lords, received the Judges, who were followed by a large concourse of ladies and gentlemen, peeresses, foreign ambassadors, &c. The Lord Chancellor having taken the chair at the upper end of the House, the Judges proceeded to open the respective Courts.

THE ANGLO-CATHOLIC CHURCH IN MARYLEBONE.—At All Saints' district Church, St. Marylebone, the scene presented to the congregation last Sunday morning was of a very extraordinary character. A high altar was erected at one end of the church. It was surmounted by large brazen cross, and close to it stood two large candles, in golden candlesticks. The altar was covered with elaborately wrought cloths of various colours and flowerless resources of our commercial enterprise, available space in the church was covered with flowers, and even bound round the pillars with evergreens. Behind the cross on the altar were placed, occupying the full breadth of the altar, and of the height of about a foot, a series of candles, and behind that again an immense framed red cloth extending from the altar to the ceiling, and of a somewhat darker red, over the whole of that stood the cross and candlesticks. On the altar table, surrounded with a cross. At the end of the church was a large cross wrought on velvet, which, being placed against a deep red cloth or curtain, presented a very striking appearance. The service for the celebration of the Holy Communion which were placed upon the altar and which are covering. At every stage of the service, everything being in readiness, the organ struck up, and a procession of priests and choristers emerged from the vestry-room. It consisted of ten or twelve choristers and four priests. Including the Rev. Upton Richards, incumbent of the district. Three of them, being Oxford men, were the black hood with the white fur, and the fourth, a Cambridge man, wore the black hood with the white silk lining. All of them wore a medal pendant from the back of their necks. The procession was headed by a chorister in a surplice, and up a large centre aisle, and with a bell, on approaching the steps of the altar, he knelt, holding it up with a priest who officiated at the altar, and chanted the anthem in which they had been engaged with a processional cross. ## NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Easter Tuesday in 1857 will be remembered in the Royal household. Between the birthdays of Princess Alice (1843) and Prince Leopold (1853) is now interpolated a third April fête, in honour of the arrival of a fifth Princess, her Majesty's ninth child. Hoc novies cantare jubet. The admirable example which the Queen sets to her lady subjects of reasonable hours and constant exercise happily enables us upon all these interesting occasions to add that "the Sovereign's health is admirable, as is that of the Royal infant."

The elections may be said to be over, and scrutinising politicians are analysing the returns to see how parties now stand. The general result is so satisfactory that a very fair margin may be left for some nondescripts who are obligingly battledored from one side to the other in the uncertainty of their intentions. The union of factions placed Lord Palmerston in a minority of 16, and he meets a new Parliament (in which two out of the three factions are annihilated) with a majority of about 100. The natural anxieties of Lord Derby, lest he should be summoned by his Sovereign to make a Cabinet of Malmesburys and Liddells (his terrors did an English gentleman honour) have been now completely dissipated, and that eminent patron of the course can apply himself with a tranquil mind to the approaching struggle for the Blue Ribbon of the Turf. Mr. Bright takes farewell of his constituents in a reproachful and defiant address, and there seems no reason why Manchester should not add to her Art-Treasures portraits of Messrs. Gibson and Cobden, seeing that her ex-representatives are celebrities of days gone by. Still, it must not be supposed that the new Parliament will be voiceless, though so many professed orators are gone. Sir James is there, prepared to do his best to submit the Liberals to what he calls the "baptism of fire"—meaning absence from office. Mr. Gladstone is there; and though he was branded by a Welsh manufacturer (who confronted him in his unsuccessful canvass for Sir S. Glynne) with the name of "a political coward, than whom the humblest soldier with the Crimea medal was a nobler patriot," he has recovered the effect of the Welshman's rudeness, and will have his say. And Lord John Russell is there, with his own consent to be Premier whenever chance shall favour him. There, too, is the regular Opposition, some 270 strong; and if it can only agree upon a principle and trust a leader (neither even very likely), it may give trouble. But the Palmerston party are now in condition to sweep the field -

As down came the Templars, like Cedron in flood.

The people have stood by their Minister, and now their Minister has but to stand by the people—and he stands upon a rock.

Paris has welcomed the gallant Todtleben, whose engineering talents were displayed to our cost during the Crimean campaign. He will, of course, be equally welcomed in England. With all deference to his abilities, we believe that if he is really admitted to a knowledge of our military and naval secrets, he will allow that the splendid and obstinate defence which the British Horse Guards and Admiralty have protracted for so many years behind the intrenchments of routine, and against the advance of innovation and improvement, which are only just now effecting a lodgment, would anything within his experience, and if he takes a lesson from them, his next fortress will be rendered impregnable. He confirms the statement that, had Lord Raglan's advice been taken, and a dash made upon Sebastopol after the Battle of the Alma, the stronghold must have fallen, for there was no force to defend it. We might have had both Cronstadt and Sebastopol had we snatched at the fortune that, contrary to the proverb, certainly offered itself twice, though at opposite points.

Little had been heard for a long time of Walker, the American "Explorer." It was doubtful, until very lately, whether he were still to be the heroic crusader, carrying the banner of freedom and civilisation into savage lands, or the audacious, but incompetent, adventurer, who was actuated by cupidity to an expedition alike unjust and impolitic. His entire failure has, of course, settled the question, and heroism repudiates an aspirant who has been unfortunate. Abandoned by his own men, and pressed by the enemy, Walker was, at the last advices, in an almost hopeless condition—too hopeless, apparently, for him to have a chance left of proving, by success, that he is a great man and his enterprise a virtuous and noble effort in the interest of civilisation.

At home the people have been making their accustomed holiday, but the weather has not been in their favour, with the exception of a warm Good Friday. But the English folk are not much in the habit of regarding the weather, except in very extreme cases. On Good Friday afternoon, and their perfect good behaviour and enjoyment must still be cited as evidence in favour of the extension of such recreation, though it is really an insult to the respectable artisans of the metropolis to record that, "having been allowed to go out, they were very good boys." The abominations of Greenwich fair have been suppressed, and the noble park is open to the holiday maker; while the ruffianism and vice which used to be poured into it are no longer invited by the vulgar temptations of the fair. No one appears to have deplored the abolition save those who hitherto profited by the nuisance. The Zoological Gardens, the Museum, and the few other rational amusements open to the humbler classes, were thronged; and the people manifested their appreciation of what has been done for them, as they would do were the efforts for their instruction and amusement multiplied tenfold.

Great suspicion is prevalent in the architectural world touching the intentions of the authorities as to the plans for the new Government Offices. The public was glad to hear that the matter was to be taken in hand as a whole, and not as patchwork; and also to hear that the invitations to competition had produced no less than two hundred and fifty designs, English and foreign, for the grand new feature to be added to the metropolis. But the joy and gladness has received a singular check in the supposed discovery that public opinion is to be called in only to confirm the decision of a secret tribunal, which is to select the favoured plans, and upon which it is naturally supposed all kinds of private influences can be brought to bear. Remembering the wretched results of previous Governmental selections, the feeling, which is being excited is by no means unjustifiable; and a very ugly little word of three letters, with a very ugly meaning, is being freely used, by no means with the patience of him whose name it also expresses.

Emigration Returns of Canada.—The total number of emigrants to Canada during the nine years from 1848 to 1856 was 305,730. Of these 88,721 were from England, 123,437 from Ireland, 43,214 from Scotland, 17,740 from Norway and Sweden, and 24,830 from Germany and Belgium. In 1811 the population of Upper Canada was 77,000; in 1823, 158,000; in 1834, 320 583; in 1841, 465,357; and in 1851, 952,004. The increase of population in the United States, deducting that consequent upon increase of territory, between 1840 and 1850, was 35½ per cent; the increase in Upper Canada in the same term was 104½ per cent. One considerable element in Canadian population is immigration from the United States, not of foreigners passing through, but of veritable American citizens by birth, of which the Census of 1851 returns, exclusive of their children born here, 56,941 native-born Yankees, who have fled from the greatness of the United States to partake of Canadian inferiority.

MUSIC.

Our two great Italian Operas have opened simultaneously this season: both of them on Tuesday evening last.

Her Majesty's Theatre was crowded to the doors by a most brilliant and fashionable audience, attracted by "La Favorita" and the two stars of the Italian stage, whose expected appearance has excited so much interest, together with the prettiest of ballets, "La Esmeralda," revived after an interval of ten years.

Critical remarks on an opera so well known as "La Favorita" would nowadays be out of place. It is sufficient to say that it is one of the last and best of Donizetti's works, exhibiting a great knowledge of his art and command over its resources than are to be found in his earlier compositions. The subject, too, being exceedingly dramatic, and full of interest and pathos, has inspired him with many original and beautiful thoughts: though it must be admitted that this opera is a very unequal work, its beauties being alloyed with a good deal of baser matter—trivial melodies loaded with noisy, unmeaning accompaniments.

Signor Giuglini, the new tenor, of whose brilliant Italian career so much has been said, appeared in the character of Fernando, and Mademoiselle Spezia, also a young and renowned singer and actress, in the part of Leonora, the frail but interesting heroine. Both justified the reputation they have brought with them, and successfully underwent the ordeal of English criticism, which, severer than that of any other musical country, often refuses to ratify the judgments either of Italy, Germany, or France.

About Giuglini there is nothing that can be called striking, either in his aspect, action, or vocal execution. He is well made, but rather short in stature; and his features, without being handsome, are thoughtful and expressive, with somewhat of a grave and melancholy cast. His manner is quiet and undemonstrative. He does not seek to display his powers, but allows them to develope themselves as they are called for by the exigencies of the scene. His great dissimilarity in this respect from the generality of performers seemed at first to be a little time to his disadvantage. Because he did not at first show any remarkable degree of power, either vocal or histrionic, it began to be surmised that he did not possess it; and the curtain fell at the end of the first act amid much shaking of critical heads. But as the interest deepened, and the scenes became impassioned, Giuglini rose in the same degree. The tones of his voice swelled with energy, and quivered with emotion; his action became more and more animated and vehement—his very form seemed to dilate, till, in the scene which terminates the second act, where Fernando furiously tears off his decorations, the price of his dishonour, breaks his sword across his knee, and casts the fragments at the feet of his Sovereign, his grand picture of contending passions roused the audience to an enthusiasm, which they vented without restraint, in shouts and thunders of applause. In the pathetic scenes which precede the catastrophe he exhibited beauties different in kind but equal in degree; the most exquisite softness, the most heart-touching tenderness; showing that every passion, every feeling, of the human heart was within the reach of his powers. The effect of the whole was enhanced by the purity, refinement, and finish of his singing. His voice, powerful and beautiful as it is, cannot, perhaps, be said to be equal to Mario's; but, in artistic acquirement, our present impression is that he is at least Mario's equal, if not his superior—reminding us, indeed, of the greatest tenor who has lived in our day, the unrivalled Rubini.

Mdlle. Spezia, too, fulfilled the expectations to which her Italian fame had given rise. She is indeed a very delightful performer—young, handsome, and full of grace, intelligence, and feeling. Her voice is somewhat thin, especially in the high notes of the scale; but it is uniformly sweet and sympathetic; her execution, though not remarkably brilliant, is clear and finished, and she always sings deliciously in tune—a much rarer merit, even among great singers, than is commonly supposed. She seemed much alarmed at the tides of feeling the terrible London audience, and her agitation, for a time, was painfully apparent. But her kind reception restored her courage; and she performed her part with a success constantly increasing, till, at the end, she fully shared with Giuglini the enthusiastic plaudits which accompanied the fall of the curtain.

Signor Violetti, another new comer, who performed the part of Baldassare the venerable monk, made a successful début, and will be a great acquisition to the company. He is a basso profondo, with a fine and powerful organ; and his action showed intelligence and dignity. The part of the King was sustained by Beneventano, whose acquaintance we made last season. The opera was got up in a manner worthy of this great theatre. The chorus and orchestra (which has been strengthened by several new performers of the highest class) were admirable; and the mise en scène was rich and beautiful.

The ballet introduced two stars of the first magnitude—Mdlle. Pocchini and M. Massot. They appeared in the parts of the young gipsy girl Esmeralda, and the crazed poet Gringoire, bringing back to us, in the most lively manner, the days when these parts were so delightfully sustained by Carlotta Grisi and Perrot, to whom both these strangers bear a remarkable likeness.

The Royal Italian Opera (at the Lyceum) opened with the "Puritani" and a divertissement called "Les Abeilles." The fine but excessively hackneyed opera did not present the slightest novelty. Grisi was the heroine, Gardoni Poliione, Tagliafico Giorgio, and Graziani Riccardo. This cast was the same as last year, excepting only the substitution of Tagliafico for Formes. Grisi was received with all the customary enthusiasm, and well deserved her reception. It is true that she is no longer the youthful sylphic vestris, who charmed the whole world in the character twenty years ago; and those who (not unreasonably) require something like illusion, even on the opera stage, cannot but feel disappointment. But Grisi is the Queen of Song, and maintains her unquestioned supremacy. She sang exquisitely—her beauty, though matronly, was as noble and commanding—and her acting as pathetic, as ever. The male performers were all suffering from the "skyey influences," their singing being not a little marred by hoarseness. On this account the popular duet, "Suoni la tromba," was omitted. The orchestra and chorus were magnificent as usual; and Costa, the admirable chef d'orchestre, was loudly greeted on making his appearance. The divertissement was slight, but pretty; and served to introduce a new and very charming danseuse, Mdlle. Esper, who was warmly applauded.

Henry Russell.—At the Princess' Theatre on Monday evening and during the past week this celebrated composer and vocalist gave his entertainment of the "Far West and Negro Life" to crowded and enthusiastic audiences. We have often had occasion to notice the dramatic power of this gentleman, the excellence of his musical champion and the stirring character of the songs which he sings. Mr Russell has lost none of his dramatic ability in these respects, but does appear to be beginning to neglect his musical powers with perhaps unwarrantable haste. As an accompanist to his own songs, he seems to us to be just as perfect as the graceful facility to which he gives way allows him to be. The audience last week seemed to take as much delight in his entertainment as they did in its earliest times with the subject matter was fresh and the half minutes half vocal, half dramatic between the songs. Mr Russell, we could hear, has always entertainment in preparation as well as public object ready, and, we suppose, as regards treasure.

THE THEATRES, &c.

Drury Lane.—A sudden change took place in the destinies of this house by a determination at the eleventh hour to engage Mr. Charles Dillon for the Easter week. That gentleman had been already selected for the leadership of the campaign at Sadler's Wells, but his appearance there is postponed for the purpose of his making it at the larger theatre. As an extra attraction, the scenery of the Lyceum burlesque, with its unrivalled transformation climax, was transferred to the stage of old Drury, and united with the best of the Beverley scenes in the pantomime of "Margery Daw." Such a combination of attractions is denominated on the bills an "Easter Festival," and could not fail of popularity. The tragedy of "Othello" was performed on Monday, "Richelieu" on Tuesday; and these, including "Hamlet" and other first-class dramas, not only have been calculated to exhibit the actor in his best attributes, but to restore for a brief while its ancient character to this once classic stage We have only to add that on Thursday the part of Ophelia was performed by Miss Edith Heraud.

Haymarket.—The reduced prices at this house ensured a large audience on Monday. A new burlesque by Mr. Tulfourd was produced. The subject we have already announced under the title of "Atalanta; or, the Three Golden Apples." Mr. Tulfourd is to be commended not only for the fun and the pun with which this subject is treated, but for the liberality with which he has [illegible] Mr. Charles Matthews, Mr. Wigan, and Mrs. [illegible] provided for—the former as an amusing [illegible] the latter as a venerable nurse. The scenery throughout was superb, and the [illegible] tableau indescribable. But we have no doubt that, under the improved arrangements of the tariff, it will be witnessed by all playgoers.

Strand.—This little house also sported burlesque—the subject here being "William Tell," which was caricatured for the purpose by Mr. Leicester Buckingham. Undoubtedly there is much smartness, vigour, and point in this production, and it overflows with allusions to every possible topic; but this universality required breadth of canvas, and consequently the piece had the disadvantage of being too long. This not only told on the audience, but on the actors, who had to be prompted almost throughout. The curtain, at length, fell prematurely, and the final business had to be guessed at by the audience, who took the disappointment with extreme good humour. When the performers have become perfect in the text the burlesque has merit enough to command more than ordinary success.

Surrey.—A new drama was produced at this house under the title of "The Iron Arm," connected with the Reign of Terror and French manners, and founded on a "stolen marriage." The Marquis De la Brielle has the misfortune to have a hypocritic villain for his private secretary, one Simonet (performed by Mr. Basil Potter), who has secretly married Therese, his patron's daughter, and committed the fruit of their concealed union (a son), to the Foundling Hospital. The lady is, of course, destined by her father for a nobler mate, the Vicomte de Richebois. Simonet is connected with a gang that meets in a low tavern, under the direction of Malaventure, or Iron Arm (who is boldly portrayed by Mr. Shepherd); and in the course of the plot, Simonet forms the plan both of poisoning the Marquis and the bandit. This plan is carried out with melodramatic minuteness, and would have been successful but for the treachery of one of the band. Things, accordingly, take such a turn, that Simonet is the victim, though Iron Arm is shot. The denouement restores the foundling child to its mother, now freed from a disgraceful alliance. The part was

THE EAST INDIAN RAILWAY.

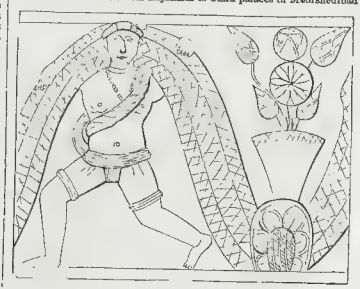
Of the works upon this important railway, now under construction, from Calcutta and the Valley of the Ganges to Delhi and the North-west Frontier, several Views have already appeared in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. The line is rich in fine scenery, and old forts and palaces, which are hedged with historic and romantic associations. A few of these interesting localities we are enabled to illustrate from sketches by an obliging correspondent, Mr. Edward Braddon, Assistant Engineer of the Railway.

Two of the localities are intimately connected with the close of that struggle which placed Meer Saffir on the throne at Moorshedibad, and added India to England's possessions. One of these scenes is the ruin of a musjid, or Mahometan place of worship, attached to the Singh-i-dulan, or Palace of the Lion. The early history of the Singh-i-dulan, like all Hindoo histories, is very confused, and strongly tinctured with mythological fable. It is said to have been built by Balaram, brother of Krishna, after his war with Bansasur. Bolaram and Krishna are some such mythical beings as Castor and Pollux: their victories are the theme of Bengali heroics, and they are worshipped by the Hindoos with as much fanaticism as obtains during the rites of Doorga. But the probable history is the more modern and less generally known one. The Singh-i-dulan is a portion of an immense pile of buildings—palaces, outhouses, courts, gardens, fountains, and gateways—that is known as Rajmahal, or the Palace of Royalty; and its origin appears to be as follows. The Sultan Akbur appointed a Hindoo named Mau Singha Vice-Regent in Bengal. Mau Singha chose Rajmahal as his place of residence, and commenced building there. But, in native courts, jealousy and deceit are the leading features; and, from the Vizier to the sweeper, all truckle for the favour of their lord, and use their best (or worst) endeavours to oust their fellow-servants. Mau Singha's success, and the estimation he was held in by his Sovereign, roused the ire of another servitor of Akbur; and Futehjung Khan commenced at once, assisted by cunning and malice, to undermine the position of his Hindoo rival. He reported to Akbur that Mau Singha was building a palace called Rajmahal (a Hindoo name), and a temple for Hindoo (and therefore heterodox) rites; that his conduct evinced premeditated revolt and heresy; and, in short, that Mau Singha was a traitor to be summarily put out of his, Futehjung Khan, the faithful servant and Moslem's, way.

Mau Singha gained, probably by duplicity again, tidings of his fellow-statesman's coup-d'état, and hastened to repair his error, and avoid the pending bowstring—he altered the name of his palace from Rajmahal to Akburnagur (the city of Akbur), thereby complimenting the vanity of Akbur, and turned the Hindoo temple in posse to a Moslem musjid in esse, by which act of deference to the faith of his Sovereign he sealed his own pardon. The concluding portion of the history of Rajmahal Mau Singha and Futehjung Khan need be but brief. Rajmahal ceased to be the abode of royalty shortly after the Battle of Plassy, and its last visit from Siraj-u-dowlah, the deposed Nawaub of Bengal, was paid when he was flying before Meer Saffir and the English standards. The most valuable portion of the material was removed from Rajmahal to build palaces in Moorshedibad (the city where now resides the Nawaub of Bengal), and the fine old building rapidly became a ruin. Mau Singha and Futehjung lived in enmity till the latter met his death at the hands of the victorious Hindoo.



IDOL FOUND AT MUTTRA.

TELEAGHURRY FORT, THROUGH WHICH THE RAILWAY PASSES.

Next is the Gate of Teleaghurry Fort, through which passes the line of railway. Teleaghurry is a place of some note. From its strong natural position it was the last scene of Siraj-u-dowlah's struggle for supremacy. On one side bounded by the Ganges, whose current washed its walls, it had on the other an impassable range of hills—the jungle on which resisted any attempt at advance. The citadel was on a rock, going sheer down to the river; and the east and west sides, which were not naturally protected, were hemmed in by walls built of strong brickwork faced with stone. Siraj-u-dowlah thought the place impregnable, and ordered it to be held against Meer Saffir's forces and the English; but the General in command declined the onus and danger of such a proceeding; he temporised with the enemy, and, after keeping up the appearance of resistance, and a blank fire for two days, he surrendered and gave over Teleaghurry to the besiegers. The guns with which this harmless fusilade was kept up have since done much more harm to the English than was done during the siege, for the magistrate of Bhaugulpore having fired a salute with them, one or all—I don't know which burst, thereby shattering the nerves and singeing the hair of the magistrate.

The Engineer's Camp shows that the engineer has often of necessity to lead a nomadic life—the tent under a tree—the horses tied to a bamboo in the open air—the bullocks released from the "hackeray," standing and lying, chewing lazily the cud, that for the present, and until they are released to graze, is all they can chew—the goat which gives the morning milk and bleats his "milk below" as a wakening call—all this is peculiarly gipsy-like and interesting. But with a vertical sun pouring his rays through tree and canvas,—a brick wall won't stop them; with the thermometer at 110 deg., and the perspiration pouring in torrents from him, the engineer scarcely appreciates his tented life, and would be better pleased with lodgings in an ice-pit or with truth as a chum at the bottom of a well.

The Engineer's Residence stands on an eminence near the city of Mattra, parallel to, and looking over, the East India Railway Company's line of railway, now in progress, which, when opened, will be one of if not the most extensive and longest lines in the world, and which will, at no very distant day, be the direct road to England, conveying on its iron surface, over arid soils, sandy deserts, raging torrents, and the rich and fertile plains of the East, an enormous traffic, which even now exists. The mode of transit being at once altered, from the rudest, slowest, and most uncivilised in every particular, to the most rapid and civilised at present known, nearly all the connecting links between the states of originality and enlightenment of the present age are about to be passed over. The house shown in the view is 100 feet in length, the ground on which it stands being terraced from the flower-garden in front to the railway beneath, a very pretty avenue planted with trees extending from the macadamised road, which runs from Agra to Delhi. As a protection against the rays of the sun, there is a wide verandah round the house, the roof of which is built of stone and supported by square pedestals and arches, the upper roof being surrounded by a pretty balustrade The landscape on all sides of the house is very pleasing. The house lies due north and south. To the east or front stands a very large Mussulman temple, built of red sandstone, under the idea of being kept in a state of preservation, but in reality going to ruins. Still further east is Muthee, one of the oldest, holiest, and most bigoted of the Indian cities: it lies on the banks of the fickle Jumna, which this year has changed its course south of the town, taking away the greater portion of a village, a bungalow, and part of a very pretty road, planted with old trees—running into the same bed which it occupied some years ago. The distance from this to Agra is thirty-four miles, ninety-four from Delhi, and twenty six to Bhurtpore, which our army had so much trouble to take under Combermere. To the rear of the house is a Jain temple, the Jain Hindoos being distinguished from the other castes their manner of living and mode of worship. From sunset to sunrise they neither eat nor drink, and they wear only a naked figure. The building partakes more of the Saracenic order of architecture than the one in front; it is very large, entirely surrounded by trees. The cupolas and domes painted white above the trees have a most dazzling effect in the bright sunshine. In digging out the foundations of the house and making some other excavations, several idols of stone, more or less mutilated, were found. The accompanying sketch is taken from a highly-sculptured block or slab of red sandstone; it represents a nature supposing something like a snake.

A CURIOUS BREACH OF CONTRACT.—A very curious case was submitted to the Paris Tribunal of Commerce on Saturday. Madame Legrand, widow of a manufacturer of works of art in bronze, sold, in 1851, to MM. Rolland and Putheaux, the manufactory which she had carried on with her late husband, and by the deed of sale undertook herself from entering into partnership with any bronze manufactory at Paris. Some time after, Rolland and Putheaux learned that she was engaged to be married to a manufacturer of bronzes in Paris, named Bonnotte, and they gave her a formal notice not to effect the marriage, because it would be a violation of her engagement not to embark in the bronze trade. She disregarded the notice, and was in due time married to Bonnotte. On Saturday Rolland and Putheaux brought an action, before the Tribunal of Commerce, to obtain from her 25,000f. as damages for having, by the marriage, violated her agreement with them; but the tribunal decided that the marriage in itself was not a breach of the agreement; and that it was not proved that Madame Bonnotte had any interest, as a trader, in the business of her husband. It accordingly dismissed the action with costs. —Galignani's Messenger.

A CHEAP JESUIT.—The Rev. Father Lefevre, of the order of the Jesuits, has issued the following extraordinary circular to the ladies of the Faubourg St. Germain:—"Madame:—Being in want of means for the construction of the church which our company is causing to be built in the Rue de Sèvres, we have thought it advisable to have recourse to lottery. But the company being poor, we have no money to give as a prize, I have resolved, madame, to offer myself as one. Each ticket will cost 100 f., and the lady who may win me will have me at her disposal during three days, either to preach or, for any work she may be pleased to designate."—Letter from Paris.

INCIDENTS OF SLAVERY.—Two slaves (a yellow man and a black) owned by a Nashville hotelkeeper attempted to escape from bondage last by travelling by railway together in master's clothes. They efficiently white to carry out the deception, until recognised by a Nashville merchant, Mr. Conrad Fox, who was on his way to New York. Levi, the yellow man, finding he was discovered, drew a pistol and shot himself in the abdomen, and afterwards cut his throat, preferring death to a return to slavery.—New York Times, March 28

ENGINE MANUFACTURING IN PRUSSIA.—In Borsig's locomotive manufactory, the most important of the private manufactories of Berlin, which, all branches taken together, may amount to forty in number, the 788th locomotive has just been completed. This manufactory, during the comparatively short time of its existence, has produced of locomotives alone a value of about £2,000,000.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

NOTWITHSTANDING that the prices of National Stocks have somewhat recovered from last week's depression, the market for those Securities has been by no means active since we last wrote. In the early part of the present week the quotations, under the influence of rather extensive purchases on the part of the public, were the advance; subsequently, however, the improvement has not been supported. The demand for money has been very extensive, and, as a necessary consequence, the rates of discount rule high. The Lombard-street the banking is charging 6½ to 6¾ for sixty days' to three months' paper, and 6¼ to 6½ per cent for four months' bills. The discount-houses have freely offered 5¾ and even 6 per cent for money on call; and the joint-stock banks are giving 5¾ per cent for sums above £250. In the Stock Exchange money has been worth 1 to 7¾ per cent for short periods. These high rates have checked extensive operations for a rise in the funds; yet our impression is that the quotations have seen the lowest range for the present, as there is now every reasonable prospect of a steady increase in the stock of gold in the Bank of England. The demand for that metal owing in a great measure to the Bank of France having lowered the rate of premium for export to the Continent has fallen off, hence nearly £500,000 of the recent imports from Australia has been retained here; and, in the event of the gold now on passage being sent into the Bank of England which is pretty generally expected we may have easier discounts. Several parcels of gold remitted to Paris within time since have been returned; and it is satisfactory to find that as exchange operations the shipment of gold is unprofitable. The arrivals during the week have been about £400,000, including about £100,000 in silver; but nearly £2,000,000 will be forwarded to India by the next packet. At St. Petersburg the exchange is in favour of England to some extent; but we cannot expect arrivals from that quarter, as the export of gold is still prohibited.

The Silver Market has been rather flat; but sales of Chilian dollars have been effected at 58½ per ounce.

We learn that the Government of France have resolved to renew the charter of the Bank of France for fifty years, on condition that its present capital of £2,650,000 be doubled, and that the whole of the additional amount be invested in the Public Funds of the country. Should richly-moulded arches resting on slender clustered columns. The chancel arch and arches to side chapel are carried on clustered shafts of Devon marble, and the internal arches of all the chancel windows are supported by columns of the same beautiful material from the quarries at Babbicombe.

The stone and wood carving, both externally and internally, is beautifully executed, and natural types have been throughout adopted, selected from flowers and plants from the neighbourhood. Mr. Farmer, of London, was the chief carver employed. The interior is fitted with solid oak benches, and the chancel with stall seats and subsella, richly carved with angel figures and foliage. Prayers will be said from litany-desks in the chancel, and the lessons from a brass lectern at the arch to the nave. The pulpit is elaborately carved in Caen stone, with subjects delicately sculptured in alto-relievo representing the preachings of our Blessed Lord, and SS. Peter and Paul: it rests upon detached columns of serpentine. The sermon-desk is formed of a carved stone eagle at one angle. A richly-carved alabaster font on a clustered serpentine shaft is placed at the west end of the nave. The roofs are very much enriched with traceried principals and cornices: that to the chancel is vaulted and panelled in oak, the ribs rising from an enriched angel cornice.

The floors of the church are entirely laid with red Staffordshire tiling. The chancel is raised three steps and laid with Minton's tiles, the arms of Mr. Greville Smyth being inlaid; the sanctuary is raised two more steps, and both that and the altar footpace are floored with encaustic tiles. There is a richly-composed triple sedilia on the south of the altar, and an oak credence-table on the north side. The great east window is filled with painted glass by O'Connor—the crucifixion occupying the upper part, and subjects from the life of Christ below.

The west tower window is by Hardman, and represents a kneeling figure of the late Bishop offering up a model of the church. This window is designed by the inhabitants of Stapleton as a memorial to Bishop Monk, and to show their appreciation of his noble gift to the parish. The windows of the aisles are of three lights, filled with elaborate and varied tracery, those in the south aisle are filled with painted glass by the Misses Monk, who also painted the large four light gable window at the east end of this aisle with the subject of the Adoration of the Kings.

The altar is vested with richly-embroidered cloths; the festival cloth (presented by Mrs. A. Way) is the work of Miss Strut, and the second cloth is embroidered by the Misses Monk.

Externally the tower (surmounted with an elegant spire) forms the principal point of attraction. The spire, built of stone of various colours, rises to a height of 170 feet, and amidst the surrounding foliage is a feature for many miles round. The tower is boldly buttressed, and has an open-traceried parapet; lofty pinnacles flank the spire and form terminations to the coupled buttresses of the angles.

The church has been rebuilt by the munificence of the late Dr. Monk, Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, whose executors have strictly carried out his Lordship's intentions since his lamented death. The chancel and its attached side chapel have been rebuilt by the lay impropriator, Mr. Greville Smyth, of Ashton Court. Both church and chancel have been executed from the designs of Mr. Norton, architect, of London.

NEW CHURCH AT STAPLETON, NEAR BRISTOL.

INNS OF COURT AND CHANCERY.

THE professors and students of the law residing in the Temple, having in the reign of Henry VI. "so multiplied that they could not be conveniently regulated in one society or contained in the old hall," they divided into the two societies thenceforth known as the societies of the Inner and the Middle Temple. These were the palmy days in which Chief Justice Fortescue wrote his celebrated treatise in praise of the laws of England; when, in the Inns of Court and Inns of Chancery, the two sorts of collegiate houses which the legal University then comprised, the Knights and Barons with other grandees and nobles of the realm were accustomed to place their sons, although their parents might not desire that they should become profoundly learned in the law or get their living by its practice. At that time there were about two thousand students in these several Inns, all of whom Fortescue says, were gentlemen by birth; and he sets down the annual expense of each student at £78—a sum equivalent, perhaps, to £450 of our money. Apropos of the division of the Templars into the societies of the Inner and the Middle Temple, it may be mentioned that early in the reign of Elizabeth the society of the Inner Temple substituted for the time-honoured bearing of the Holy Land, a rampant winged horse, with the motto, "Volat ad æthera virtus," by which device it has been thought they intended to signify—in allusion to the fable of Pegasus forming the fountain of Hippocrene by striking the rock—that the lawyers aspired to cultivate the liberal sciences and even to become poets. But, however the Inner Templars may emulate the fabled achievement of their equine prototype, the Middle Templars, we see, are going to build portices of science upon the site of their actual fountain that well-known slender jet whose waters always sounded so refreshingly when they rang on the sunny pavement, and whose of summer night by many a wearied student, has been celebrated by such pleasing poetry. This assumption of the winged horse by the one society, and the retention of the ancient Christian symbol by the other, occasioned in our own time some well-known ironical verses touching "innocence" and "expedition."

THE INNER TEMPLE.

CLOISTERS, LINCOLN'S INN CHAPEL.

From the time of the dissolution of the fraternity of Hospitallers the professors and students of law in the Temple remained in possession of all the property they had held from the time of Edward II., but without obtaining any confirmation from the Crown until the 6th James I., when the King granted to them, at the accustomed rent of £10, which was then paid by each society, all the property of which they were then and are now in possession, to serve (as the grant expresses it) "for the entertainment and education of the students and the professors of the laws residing in the Inns of the Inner and the Middle Temple forever;" and the Templars thereupon made the Kings magnificent present of a stately cup of pure gold weighing two hundred ounces. In the second half of the previous century many buildings were erected in the Temple, the most remarkable of which is the present Hall of the Middle Temple, completed in A.D. 1572, where "Twelfth Night" was performed on the 2nd February, 1602. The Society of the Inner Temple still assembled in the venerable hall in which they had met from the time of Edward III., and which was not taken down and rebuilt until the present century. The old fee-farm rent continued to be paid to the Crown until the time of Charles II., when it was purchased by the societies. In the mean time many of the courts and buildings that now exist were erected; and at this time, so enormously has the property increased in value, the rental exceeds £16,000 a year.

But it is time to pass from the Temple to mention some facts connected with the other societies. It must be remembered that it is not the object of this paper to trace their history, or to give any account of their possessions, for there are books in which these particulars may be found. We mention only such facts derived from the evidence given before the Commissioners, as the general reader may care to know with regard to the origin and actual state of the Inns of Court.

And first as to Lincoln's Inn. The Temple has been called the mother, and most ancient of all the Inns; but Lincoln's Inn as a seat of legal learning seems to have been coeval in its origin with the Temple, for it became a place of lodging and education for students of the law in the reign of Edward II., and they held upon lease the greater part of the estate which Henry III. had bestowed upon the See of Chichester in this locality. The earliest muniments of title at Lincoln's Inn do not afford evidence of any grant from the Crown; nor can the history of the society be traced for the century and a half which elapsed between the time when the lawyers came to occupy the noble mansion of the Earl of Lincoln and the time of Chief Justice Fortescue (himself a member of Lincoln's Inn), to which era the foundation of their library, the most ancient collection in London, is referred. Between the days of Agincourt and those of the Armada, the society of Lincoln's Inn advanced in prosperity and importance, but it did not acquire the fee-simple of its property until the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Its chief buildings were raised in the Tudor age, and even then Lincoln's Inn was famous for the walks under the elms, which are celebrated by Ben Jonson. The old hall long used for commons in term and by Chancellors out of term dates from the time of Henry VII., and the fine old gate tower was erected by Sir Thomas Lovell, in 1518. Most of the old buildings were raised in that century or in the time of James I., of which period is the chapel. With these characteristic edifices of olden time, and the chief additions of modern time—we mean the fine Corinthian front of stone buildings and the noble new hall which recalls the architecture of Eton College—Lincoln's Inn can boast quite a varied group of historical and picturesque buildings. The income of Lincoln's Inn from rents was nearly £10,000 in the year 1854, and from payments by members upwards of £8000 more; but the outgoings (which include £1350 for interest of debt incurred for the new building) exceeded £14,000.

The origin of the Society of Gray's Inn seems involved in mystery. The lawyers of Gray's Inn are mentioned as early as the reign of Edward III., and from that time they held the property of the Inn under the Lords de Gray. "The manor of Portpoole and Gray's Inn" was both acquired and lost by the prior and monks of Sheen, in the reign of Henry VIII., and for the Gray's Inn property a fee-farm rent of £6 13s. 4d. was paid by the society to the Crown, until the year 1734, when it was purchased from the representatives of the Crown-grantees. The real property of the Inn produces a rental of about £370 a year. If in recent times this ancient Inn has fallen from the rank and estimation it once enjoyed, and cannot rival the other Inns of Court in the academical distinction, the patrician family, or the professional eminence of its members, it could boast great men as more than one period of its history; and in the seventeenth century was famous for its Readings as well as Revels. From the time of Bacon, who appears, from his accounts as Treasurer, to have planted elm-trees in Gray's Inn, it has been famous for its gardens. Howell, in the reign of Charles I., speaks of the far-stretching, delightful prospect they enjoyed, and of the choice walks to which the beauties both of City and suburbs were accustomed to resort in the summer to breathe fresh air—and, we dare say, disturb the thoughts of the studious lawyers.

Passing now from the Inns of Court to the lesser houses called Inns of Chancery, we find the same obscurity with regard to their origin. During the fifty years of Edward III.'s reign, only two of the lesser Inns that now exist—viz., Clifford's Inn and Thavie's Inn were known. In the reign of Henry VI.—or, at all events, at the time when Fortescue wrote his work on the Laws of England—the Inns of Chancery had increased to ten in number; but about the year 1580 they had become reduced to eight; and of those only five now remain, the rest of the existing Inns of Chancery being of later foundation. The cause of the distinction between Inns of Court and Inns of Chancery is to be found, according to Mr. Foss, in the fact that the students in the latter studied the elements of the law, and the original writs, which were then prepared in the Chancery. Be this as it may, the lesser houses seem to have been auxiliary to the Inns of Court; and formerly there was a custom (but it had become obsolete in the reign of Charles I.) that a student for the Bar be first admitted of an Inn of Chancery before becoming a member of an Inn of Court. Of that custom we have an illustrious example in Sir Thomas More, for he studied law at New Inn previously to entering at Lincoln's Inn, of which Society he afterwards became Reader. From the evidence given by the Antients, as they are called, of the present Inns of Chancery, they appear to be mere voluntary societies, none of which acknowledge trusts for the education of their members, or do anything to advance the study of the law; nor, indeed, have these societies any funds available for such purposes. The origin of their assumed connection with the Inns of Court is not made out: but it cannot be doubted that they were educational establishments, and the halls which many of them still possess show their fitness for collegiate purposes. In neither of the two Inns of Chancery that date from the time of Edward III. has any trace been found of an original connection with the Inns of Court, or of the lesser houses having stood in a subordinate relation to them.

One of those ancient Inns of Chancery is Clifford's Inn, which derives its name from the noble family to whom it once belonged, whose lease of it to students of the law was granted in 1344, when the property was described as "adjoining the Church of St. Dunstan-in-the-West, in the suburbs of London." The other is Thavie's Inn, where apparitors of the Bishop of London were accustomed to dwell even before that date. Three other Inns of Chancery now existing are older than the reign of Queen Elizabeth. One of these is New Inn, which became a house for students of the law in the fifteenth century, but after 1485. On the destruction of Strand Inn, by Protector Somerset, the students removed to New Inn; "it being," as we read, "also under the government of the Middle Temple"—a statement which seems to indicate that both Inns were affiliated to the greater Inn of Court.

CLIFFORD'S INN: THE HALL.

New Inn, like most of the other Inns of Chancery, is governed by Principal and Antients, who, like the Knights of King Arthur, dine at their round table, but do not seem to have any privileges or powers available for promoting legal studies.

BURAZJOON, BETWEEN BUSHIRE AND SHIRAZ.

THE PERSIAN WAR.

We have to thank an officer of the Bombay Engineers for the two accompanying Sketches.

Burazjoon is situated inland at the foot of the hills, about forty miles from Bushire, and is one of the principal towns on the high road to Shiraz. The ground about is very fertile and richly cultivated. All kinds of vegetables grow to perfection there. The inhabitants are a marauding set. The men fine, strongly built, with a hang-dog look; the women, like all Persian women, ugly. Near the village was the Persian camp, which was evacuated on the approach of the British force on the 9th of February. The sketch is taken from the rear of the camp, which lay between the village and the hills, is concealed.

The town of Bushire is situated at the extremity of a peninsula, and is of a triangular form, having the sea (Persian Gulf) on one side, a creek on the other, and the third face running across the land from the creek to the sea. The fortifications are of no great strength, consisting of a thin curtain flanked by towers at intervals without a ditch or interior works. The masonry is of conglomerate stone of sand and shells, quarried in the vicinity. The buildings in the town are of the same material, but built in the roughest manner; and, with the exception of a few of the houses of the principal inhabitants, mean to a degree. The streets are so narrow that carts cannot pass, and they are all laid out without the slightest regularity, forming for the stranger a perfect labyrinth, dirty in the extreme, of course. The Gateway, shown in the sketch, has little architectural pretensions.

The latest accounts from Bushire come down to the 25th of February. The reports from the neighbourhood of the late encounter lead to the impression that many more of the Persians were killed at the battle of Kooshab than was believed. Hundreds of the wounded were said to be strewn near the river Daliki; and from all accounts the blow then struck has quite disorganised the army under Soojah-ool-Moolk, who, if rumour speaks truly, has been displaced from his command. The camp at Bushire was being fortified with strong redoubts; the force was remarkably healthy, and in good condition generally, provided among officers and men. The following account of the march upon Burazjoon, and the Battle of Kooshab, is from a letter in the Bombay Telegraph, by one who was present:—

Bushire, Feb. 13.

My dear [illegible] We got up [illegible] when General Outram immediately [illegible] and [illegible] inward, where a whole lot of [illegible] talking big about attacking the camp, so the force, with the [illegible] landers and 64th Regiment N.I., lately arrived from Bombay, started on the evening of the 2nd and left the batteries en route in charge of the Naval Brigade—the Semiramis, Clive, Falkland, Euphrates and gun-boats, with [illegible] Marine Artillery. On the 3rd we reached [illegible] Burazjoon, and found the Persians had made a hasty retreat, taking their guns with them, but leaving all their ammunition behind, and a large store of wheat and barley. The ammunition was all blown up—some tons of powder and heaps of shot and shell. It was blown up by Hassard, of the 2nd, and Haggard, of the Artillery, with two of Jacob's rifle shells. They fired at it at seventy yards, and the concussion sent them and the rifle flying into the air, but without hurting them. They then left Borazjoon with the prize property; and that night the enemy followed us up, and attacked our rear; on which the army formed a square round the prize property, and all lay down flat on their bellies till morning, when they went in at the Persian troops; the 3rd cavalry, Poona horse, and artillery, braving the battle. The Persians formed square, and the cavalry charged clean through it; went fierce about on the other side, and charged back; threes about, and back again, and rattled the artillery also playing upon the square. All say that the cavalry charge was one of the most splendid ever witnessed. They left about one thousand dead on the field; and the quantity of wound's must have been immense. Our troops had to come back into camp by a forced march, and were four hours coming through the "Marsh"—a swamp. Some, in fact all, came back in a dreadful state: they were panic struck as they neared our camp—men came in in masses of mud, dropping from fatigue. They were all shaking that the enemy had come down upon the rear, and crying out to pass the word for the cavalry and Poona horse; but they were in the rear coming in with the captured guns and prizes. We were kept at our guns till nearly midnight, and I kept turning my [illegible] according as we heard the volleys of the [illegible] coming in; and no end of the cries that the enemy are coming in the rear. When the last one was counted, three dozen of the people were picked up stragglers. One wounded man was handed out of his dooly, the bearers running away, leaving the poor fellow on the ground with the calf of his leg shot off by a round-shot. He returned, and took him back in a dhooly, but he died just after he came in. We were out till two in the morning, having picked up ten unfortunate devils who could not move, some of them asking us to shoot them. The General had a severe fall from his horse when the troops were attacked at Kooshab, and was insensible for two hours; but he came in all right in the afternoon, and went out again when the alarm occurred, and met us on our way back. He thanked us personally. Next morning I went out to meet the force coming in, the rearguard of the army; and as the cavalry came in by twos and threes, and saw our camp, they drew their swords in triumph, crying out "Dekho Sahib," and there they were, sure enough, blades and hilts all smeared in blood, and their white belts bespattered all over. They made a glorious charge. Poor Frankland, of the 2nd Europeans, was made Brigade-Major of Cavalry, to go out with them; and the day before they started, and in the charge he cut down the man; but the fourth shot killed him as he was in the midst of the issue, the ball penetrating into the head. Our loss was only, as far as I can learn [illegible] killed and [illegible] wounded, all of the 64th, not as yet rightly known. They speak very well on the whole of the Persian troops, and especially of their artillery. Certainly, the two guns that were captured [illegible] any of ours. Horses [illegible] and all in very fine order. They have got twenty-five prisoners, two of whom they say are Russians. The Sukh-ei-Mulk, who commanded the Persian army, narrowly escaped being taken himself, escaping without his hat. And going back with a bare head in this country, I suppose you are well aware, is a disgrace.

The following incident of the charge of the 3rd Bombay Cavalry, is from a letter from an officer:—

When Forbes, who commanded this regiment, gave the order to charge, he and his Adjutant, young Moore, placed themselves in front of the 6th troop, which was then directly opposite the nearest face of the square. He other Moore, Malcolmson, and Spens came the leading troop behind, riding knee to knee, with spurs in their horses' flanks, as if racing after a hog. In rear of them rushed the dark troopers of the 3rd, mad to avenge the deaths of poor Malet and Bashford. In spite of the heavy fire levelled at them, they tore down upon the nearest face of the devoted square. As they approached Forbes was shot through the thigh and Spens' horse was [illegible] and fell dead. [illegible] of the [illegible] flashes and the fire and the noise and crack's of the musketry, the younger Moore's horse swerved as they came up. Dropping his sword from his hand, and [illegible] letting by the knot at his bridle, he caught up the reins in both hands, screwed his horse's head straight, and then coolly, as [illegible] riding at a fence, leaped him at the square. If, therefore any man can be said to have been first, the youngest Moore is the man. Of course the horse fell stone dead upon the bayonets; so did his brother's, ridden with equal courage and determination. The elder Moore [illegible] in weight, and [illegible] thereabouts, in height—but his way out on foot. Malcolmson took one foot out of his stirrup, when he saw his brother officer down and unarmed for his sword had been broken to pieces by the fall, and, holding on to that, the younger Moore escaped. The barrier once broken, and the entrance one made, in and through it poured the avenging troopers. On and over everything they rode, till getting clear out, they re-formed on the other side, wheeled and swept back a second wave of ruin. Out of 500 Persian soldiers of the Regiment [illegible] who composed [illegible] two [illegible] Cavalry, to use their own phrase, gave our enemies "a kasah (answer) for the death of Malet Sakib Bahadur."

THE WATER OF PARIS.—In a paper lately [illegible] Academy of Sciences at Paris, M. Boussingault has shown that the water contained in the wells of Paris is impregnated with nitrate of potash or saltpetre. It is true that this water is not generally used [illegible] but a great deal—water their wine with it; and although all trace of potash is completely destroyed by it, and the nitrate taken up by vegetation, in larger doses than can be imbibed with the water, still its presence always denotes the existence of vegetable and animal matter in a state of decomposition which is most undoubtedly injurious to the public health. In consequence of this discovery the taking establishment of the hospitals of Paris has resolved to use Seine water for making bread, instead of the water brought to the wells of the municipal boundaries.

DEARTH OF BUTCHER'S MEAT IN FRANCE.—The price of meat goes on constantly increasing notwithstanding the importation of foreign cattle. The augmentation in price must be attributed, on the one hand, to a diminution in the number of animals offered for sale, and on the other to the increasing necessities of consumption. The quantity of [illegible] reported during 1856 was inferior to that of 1855. A similar diminution is manifest in England, as is proved by the official returns of the imports, and oxen, in particular, are falling off at the other side of the Channel as well as here, the fact being explained naturally by the greater consumption which takes place among other nations as well as France.—Echo Agricole.

CURIOSITIES OF THE CANVASS.

THE autobiography of a "canvasser" would furnish forth a curious and instructive book. Like lawyers and doctors and divines, the professors of this mystery see life on the "seamy" side, and realise a livelihood out of the corruption and frailties of human nature. If the body politic were sound and uncorrupt, or incapable of corruption, the canvasser's occupation would be gone. His fish are always caught in troubled waters. Vainly may he dangle his baits and spread his lines in places where the stream runs smooth and pellucid. No prey rewards him there. So well is this fact recognised that a skilful canvasser, like a veteran angler, will very soon take up his rund to other and more profitable [illegible] After traversing [illegible] up and down, whipping in a fly here and there experimentally, he pretty speedily ascertains whether there is any chance of sport, and thereupon either determines to take himself and his creels elsewhere; or, if from particular reasons tied to a particular locality, waits patiently until some "freshet" shall have made the water turbid enough for his operations. Very clever artists under these circumstances have even contrived to produce an artificial freshet for the occasion. In other words, they have managed to produce some storm of dissension, or establish a factitious state of perturbation, in the midst of which they have pursued their ordinary craft with wonderful success. These strokes of genius are, however, rare.

Under two conditions of an electoral body the labours of the canvasser are utterly thrown away. In the boroughs or counties—and there are many such—where certain individuals hold the whole constituency within their grasp, the canvasser need never come. His functions are supererogatory. As Mr. Dod phrases it, "Here the lofty influence is paramount." Sir John's steward has politely acquainted the tenants that they are expected to vote for Sir John's nominee. This is "canvass" quite sufficient for the nominee; while no amount or dexterity of canvassing would obtain for a rival more than a couple of dozen votes, recorded by electors who know that they were already in the landlord's black books, and wished accordingly to spite him. Secondly, in places and there are a few such in England—where the constituency are really free and intelligent; where the elector knows something about politics, and is able to form his own opinions respecting the merits of competing candidates; and where if, perchance, a tried member seeks re-election, the voters can appreciate past services, and spontaneously determine to support the representative who in times past has shown himself attentive to his duties, sound in his votes, and influential in promoting the local interests of the borough. Here again the canvasser is not wanted. His work is done for him; and all the clever wiles and acute diplomacy on which he prides himself would be entirely thrown away. Cases like these in the wide chaos of electioneering may one day become something more than exceptional spots in the great desert.

A constituency widely scattered, considerable in amount, and as irascible as possible, present the most favourable arena wherein the canvasser can work. Here he is in his glory. Among such electors the Napoleonic maxim may be realised—it is tout est possible. To a skilful strategist victory is certain against any odds. It will improve the chance of success under such circumstances that the candidate himself, and especially his canvassing auxiliary, should be strangers to the locality. A native may have his friends and his [illegible] but [illegible] enemies. A new-comer, by the exercise of a little dexterity, may obtain all the advantage and escape the drawbacks of this position. In fact, the model canvasser revels in hostilities and antagonism, knowing how well he may make their passions subservient to his purpoose. How this result is achieved may be seen by watching his manœuvres. For example:—Mr. Plausible (to borrow a name from John Bunyan) has private reasons for wishing to secure the return of the Hon. Mr. Spendthrift for the borough of Shakeston. He puts himself in the mail train, and, reaching the station some time before midnight, demands temporary hospitality at the Queen's Arms. The landlord of that celebrated hostelry is "Blue," and Mr. Plausible's friend happens also to be "Blue;" but that, of course, is a perfectly accidental coincidence. Next day the landlord inquires (and all inquiries are inquisitive), and after inquiry talks (and all landlords are talkative) concerning the private business of his new guest. Being dyspeptic, if the borough boasts of a mineral spring; a speculation, if the population is commercial; or attorneys, if the county has celebrated as a mere resort of fashion,—the new-comer has no intention except to make some money or extract some health and amusement. This is his external character—valetudinarian, trader, or idler, as the case may be. But beneath this external crust there lie hid volcanic agencies which presently cover the district with consternation, dust, ashes, and nobody can tell whence. Chief among the practical assistants of this operation are the local lawyers. Every experienced canvasser always engages two of this class. One is the respectable solicitor, par excellence, of the place the professional adviser, who is renowned for probity and suavity, to whom all men resort who wish for justice without costly litigation, and who officiates as the chief arbitrator and pacificator of the district. He is universally respected, extensively influential, and amply deserves all the esteem and confidence of his fellow-townsmen for the success with which he endeavours to assuage animosities, to adjust differences, and stop those growing suits, which, if only a little fomented, might end in the ruin of half the large families, for the benefit of Westminster Hall. Such a lawyer, indeed, is a benefactor to his species: and, if politically available, is at once selected as local adviser by Mr. Plausible. But beside him there is placed an unsuspected coadjutor, who proves, too often, far more active and useful. This is the sharp-set, ferret-eyed attorney, who lives upon the troubles and quarrels of his neighbours; knows all their wants and weaknesses; and commands a large number of votes by sheer terrorism. To one elector he has a mortgage; he holds a mortgage on the property of another; he stands between a third and bankruptcy; of a fourth he is cognisant of all manner of discreditable secrets and family squabbles. Such an ally, though little reputable, and half disavowed, is invaluable to the canvasser. He is paid well, and earns his money, so far as the result of the poll is concerned. There are, indeed, many boroughs in which a professional agent of this class actually sways the return. The influence of the "order" is shown whenever any question involving their personal interests happens to turn up in Parliament. When the motions respecting solicitors' duty came on for discussion, the whole House appeared white with petitions on the subject. Every member had one to present, and was especially careful to make its presentation audible and visible.

But we must not forget that canvassing is an art not limited to the sterner sex. Women often prevail where men cannot succeed; when an ambitious candidate could wish to secure. If they ever take his cause in hand or rather to heart—they are far more enthusiastic, indefatigable, and thoroughgoing than their masculine competitors. So admirable has been the result that it seems far from impossible that the fascinations of canvassing like them may [illegible] parts of [illegible] become a recognised [illegible] and [illegible] duties. Since the days when lovely Duchesses gained votes for Fox, and compliments for themselves, from the butchers of Newport Market, the co-operation of these fair, gentle canvassers has often proved the turning-point between failure and success. At the autumnal election in Westminster an old and well-deserving member was run hard, even to within twenty votes, by a new man who had contrived to enlist on his behalf the sympathies of the female population. During the elections just terminated the agencies of the gentle sex have been equally efficacious. M. Dumas has etched how the Southwark election was determined, chiefly by the influences rained down on the nomination day from an upper balcony in favour of Mr. Locke; and how Lady John Russell secured by her smiles the return of her Lord for the city of London. Another correspondent of a Paris contemporary relates how he saw with his own eyes Madame Rothschild making a tour of all the shops in High Holborn, soliciting in every case M. le boutiquier to vote for her husband, but exhibiting a polite resignation when told by any elector that he had pledged himself to the other party. At Bath the local candidate, who enjoys an estate and has cultivated an extensive acquaintance near and in that city of hot springs and pump-rooms, derived his chief chance of success from the interposition of lady-canvassers. His fair patronesses were more energetic in securing votes, and mustered strong in windows and hotel-coaches at the election. The supporters of Mr. Tite, the stranger, whose return was just won by a majority of three, very naturally remonstrated against this fair, or unfair, array of pa[illegible] ship on behalf of his opponent. Since all colours, favours, and flags are prohibited by the new Act, why, it was asked, should white cambric be waved for the encouragement of a particular candidate? If bands of music were disallowed, why were the musical cheers and ringing laughter of fair dames and demoiselles permitted for the special behoof of some femininely-favoured candidate? The question is one for the serious discussion of future election committees.

The elections just terminated have been singularly barren either of party incident or fun. For [illegible] the country was [illegible] that little opportunity was afforded for the development of character. Between the dissolution and the re-election scarcely ten days were allowed to intervene, and in that brief time it is scarcely possible to develop either a poet or a drama. For rhymes at no times have election contests been very remarkable. Most of the poetical effusions upon such occasions are founded upon mere local ideas, and [illegible] prove nearly as unintelligible to the general public as a [illegible] inscription. Some of the most piquant which have come under our own observation depended for their points upon the accident that Lord Grosvenor had his watch stolen on the day of nomination for Middlesex. In Southwark a long and prosy string of "reasons" for supporting a particular candidate was enlivened at intervals [illegible] magnificent couplet:—

Sit you still, stand you by,
You shall hear the next new cry.

Somewhat better as poetical inspiration, though still far from good, was a couplet placarded by the High Church committee ... the South Wilts election:—

Without a fault, and with lots of tin,
The best of three is Lord Henry Thynn.

But, in spite of the local Homer, Lord Henry proved at the poll the worst of the three. The result was not accidental. More trouble was taken and more money spent in securing this particular election than in any other contest among the many recently fought. Forty pair of horses, we are told, were hired in Southampton alone to bring up voters, all the available animals in the county having been also monopolised, in addition to a large contingent from London.

The late elections, partly through money, and partly from the operation or apprehension of the late Act, have proved very unproductive of jokes. One practical joke, however, of immense fun, was played off at Dudley. This borough is the sole property of Lord Ward, who, of course, ought to return a member. Just before the election it transpired that his Lordship had fallen out with his selected nominee. The electors were, consequently, not a little bewildered, and to some extent irate, at finding that the suffrages which they had made up their minds to give to Sir Stafford Northcote were to be disposed of elsewhere, through a mere whim on the part of a Peer not too celebrated for consistency. At this juncture down comes an independent candidate, and before my Lord's will can be told, or my Lord's tenets can be duly indoctrinated, the poll is over, the election declared, and Lord Ward, to his great disgust, finds that his very own borough is represented for the next seven years or so by a member who owes him no manner of allegiance.

We have kept the best joke of all to the last. It is, of course, one of French manufacture. M. Dumas (père, not fils), as our readers know, has been transmitting to the Paris Presse pretty stories concerning our English elections. In London at St. Katharine's-by-the-Tower the French littérateur of course drew his descriptions from the easiest source. One election was, to him, just as good as another, and Southwark, lying nearest to London-bridge, was first visited. Vivid descriptions of the nomination, the canvass, the polling, the declaration, and the thanksgivings, in Southwark, were accordingly transmitted by M. Dumas to our Paris contemporary. Among other sketches of persons and incidents some of his most vivid portraitures were devoted to the [illegible] candidate for the borough, Mr. A. Pellatt. So dramatic, indeed, was the picture given of this gentleman, that a rival newspaper, jealous, probably, of the talent displayed by the Presse correspondent, accused him of having drawn upon his imagination for the whole affair. In sober truth, La Vérité charges M. Dumas with having "invented" Mr. Apsley Pellatt! The joke is almost too wonderful for belief. But let us quote our contemporary's own words:

En effet, M. Alexandre Dumas a inventé un candidat qui était loin sans doute de prévoir qu'il acquerrait en France une notoriété que, sans doute, il n'obtiendra jamais dans son pays." This candidate, we are afterwards told, "est nommé Sir Pellatt," and the placard issued by his committee reminds the writer in La Vérité of "ces fameuses affiches que nous avons pu lire, en d'autres temps, sur un foule de petits monuments de Paris: Nommons, nommons Battwr!! Pellatt est un Battur anglais inventé par M. Dumas."

This was not a bad joke perpetrated by those inveterate jokesters, the Irish, at the Tipperary nomination. A gigantic blacksmith appeared on the hustings holding forth a brobdignagian key. With this key he said Dr. M'Hale had opened and shut the constituency, letting in Lady Certain Sellers and Sellers' supplementary [illegible] instrument having got out of order had been repaired with the best Swedish iron, and was then to be transferred to Father Power, with an appropriate description. The Padre in question received the trust with an appropriate speech, and great fun was the consequence at the time. But the joke, good as it was, is absolutely put aside by the idea that the creator of "Monte Christo" and the indefatigable biographer of the "Trois Mousquetaires" should also have succeeded in "inventing" Mr. Apsley Pellatt.

BELGIAN RAILWAY RULES.—The Moniteur Belge publishes a series of arrangements mutually entered into by the directors of the State railways in Belgium, in France, along the Rhine, in Prussia, and of the Great North of Germany for the better accommodation and convenience of the public. Those arrangements are to commence and take effect from the 1st of May next. Direct coupons in the form of little books will be delivered to travellers between the undermentioned localities, viz.:—On the one side: Brussels, Antwerp, Ostend, London via Ostend, [illegible] Paris via Brussels and [illegible] via [illegible] On the other: Hanover, Bremen, Hamburg, Brunswick, Magdeburg, Berlin, Leipsic, and Dresden. The coupons will be available for every train, and during the period of one month. They will be available in order to stop upon his or her journey at any of the towns at which the trains call. Two kinds of tickets will be granted, viz.—those for the first class for the whole journey, which may be called ticket tickets; that is to say, coupons for the first-class as far as Cologne, and for the second-class for places beyond Cologne—that class of carriages corresponding nearly with the first class on the English and French railways. Children of two years old and under, who do not require special places, will not be charged for. Two children under ten years of age, travelling together in the same carriage, will only pay the price of a single place. One child above two years of age will be charged the price of a single place. Each ticket of a traveller of the direct service between any of the towns above mentioned will give the right to the gratuitous transport of luggage to the amount of 50 lb. (25 kilogrammes on the entire journey. The description of the luggage [illegible] transported [illegible] [illegible] of the head of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] localities where the traveller wishes to stop, but always with the gratuitous transport of 50 lb. weight.

TENDER MERCIES OF THE PAPAL GOVERNMENT.—Since the sanguinary repulse of the political prisoners in their attempt to escape from the fortress of Palliano, on the 14th ult., measures of the strictest severity have been adopted towards them, including likewise such inmates of the prison who took no part in the affair on the outbreak. All the tenants of the most refractory wards have been put into irons, weapons having been found concealed under some part of the wall of their dormitories. The military regulations have been [illegible] to the detachment of a series of athletic forms and unyielding nerves, whose commander is said to have received carte blanche for whatever means of enforcing submission he may think necessary. Hitherto these means have been limited to fettering those prisoners considered most dangerous, and to keeping the others in continuous confinement, the usual exercise in the courtyard having been prohibited since the attempt of the 14th. Moreover, every possible article of [illegible] has been removed from the wards—pens, paper, books, inkstands, and even stuff boxes have been taken from their respective owners; many of whom, being educated men, feel with great severity the deprivation of the only solace hitherto allowed them in their weary hours of confinement, the enjoyment of literary pursuits. Basins bottles, glasses, and other trifling conveniences, permitted by the indulgence of the late commandant of the fortress, have likewise been carried off, as capable of being transformed into missile weapons, and the prisoners are simply reduced to the bare [illegible] [illegible] imagined whether this style of treatment is [illegible] [illegible] resentment of the enchained wretches still [illegible] their slaughtered comrades.—Letter from Rome

LITERATURE.

Travels and Researches in Chaldea and Susiana. By William Kennett Loftus, F.G.S. James Nisbet and Co.

Among the many wonderful achievements in science, art, and industry, for which the present generation will be justly celebrated in a future age, antiquarian researches in Asia will not prove the least remarkable. The exploration of the navigable capabilities of the Euphrates and Tigris by Colonel, now General, Chesney, the geological and geographical researches of Mr. Ainsworth in the same localities; the magnificent discovery of the site and ruins of Nineveh by Mr. Layard; and the method of deciphering the cuneiform inscriptions so ingeniously contrived by Dr. Hicks and Colonel Rawlinson—these are extensions of knowledge in the domain of utility and truth which stamp the highest honour on the middle of the nineteenth century. To this list of illustrious names we may now add that of Mr. Loftus, a man of cultivated mind, energetic in action, industrious in the collection of facts, of excellent judgment, and scrupulously cautious before arriving at decided conclusions. As stated in the preface, these volumes are the result of two visits to Chaldea and Susiana—the first, in connection with the Turco-Persian Frontier Commission, in 1849-52, under the orders of Colonel, now Major-General, Sir W. F. Williams, of Kars, Bart.; and secondly, in conduct of the Expedition sent out by the Assyrian Excavation Fund, at the end of the year 1853. Mr. Loftus has determined two material points in ancient history. He has shown that the Assyrians buried their dead at Chaldea, every mound from Niffar to Mugeyer giving evidence of its having been a necropolis: and he has demonstrated that "Shushan, the Palace" of the scriptural Esther, is identical with Susa; while, the topography being settled, a strong light is thrown on the geography of the Greek campaigns in Persia under Alexander the Great and his successors.

Mr. Layard has expressed his opinion that the great cone at Nimrûd covered a Royal tomb, but no human remains were there found; and Mr. Loftus affirms that not a single instance has been recorded of undoubted Assyrian sculpture in any one of the numerous excavations effected by the English and French Governments. If Assyria be without cemeteries, Chaldea is full of them; and the Babylonian Arrian distinctly states that the marshes south of Babylon contained the sepulchres of the Assyrian Kings. Of the necropolis cities of Chaldea, Warka is the most remarkable. Of this gigantic cemetery Mr. Loftus says—

It is difficult to convey anything like a correct notion of the piles upon piles of human relics which there utterly astound the beholder. Excepting only the triangular space between the three principal ruins, the whole remainder of the platform, the whole space between the walls, and an unknown extent of desert beyond them, are everywhere filled with the bones and sepulchres of the dead. There is probably no other site in the world which can compare with Warka in this respect: even the tombs of ancient Thebes do not contain such an aggregate amount of mortality. From its foundation by Urukh until finally abandoned by the Parthians, a period probably of 2500 years, Warka appears to have been a sacred burial-place in the same manner as the Persians at the present day convey their dead from the most distant corners of the Shah's dominions, and even from India itself, to the holy shrines of Kerbela and Meshed 'Ali, so, doubtless, it was the custom of the ancient people of Babylonia to transport the bones of their deceased relatives and friends to the necropolis of Warka and other sites in the dread solitudes of the Chaldean marshes. The two great rivers, the Tigris and the Euphrates, would, like the Nile in Egypt, afford an admirable means of conveying them from a distance even from the upper plains of Assyria.

The coffins, of various shapes, were piled on each other. Mr. Loftus drove his trenches downwards to the depth of thirty feet, and the layers were continually found: the looseness of the sand did not permit more profound excavations without danger to the workmen; but it is fairly presumed that the accumulations of the dead reached down to the base of the central platform, a depth of sixty feet. In this the necropolis were found funereal jars and sarcophagi, on which various figures were inscribed. The surfaces of many of the coffins were similarly decorated. Of these one of the most remarkable was that of a warrior, arrayed in a short close-fitting tunic and long boots of leather garments, his arms akimbo, and his legs wide astride. Engravings of these relics are given in the work. The coffins are composed of yellow clay mixed with straw, and half baked; some are glazed. Mr. Loftus found many shaped like a slipper. One of the early forms is very curious—

It resembles an oval dish cover, the sides sloping outwards towards the base, which rests on a projecting rim. The dimensions vary from four to seven feet long, about two feet wide, and from one to three feet deep. On carefully removing the cover the skeleton is seen resting generally on the left side, but trussed like a fowl, the legs being drawn up and bent at the knees to fit the size of the cover. Sometimes the skull rests on the bones of the left hand, whilst those of the right—holding cylinders of the same material as stone and some small personal ornaments—have fallen into a copper bowl in front. In one instance I ascertained that an enormous quantity of hair was confined in a finely-worked head-dress, the meshes of which were distinctly discernible. There were also fragments of blue linen upon various parts of the skeletons, and the remains of a wooden box, which had contained two massive shells (Cypræa moneta) and one of the same species as those occurring abundantly in the ruins. The bones of the toes, fingers, ankles, and wrists were encircled with bangles or rings of brass.

The discoveries of Mr. Layard and of his successors, together with the ingenious method of interpreting the cuneiform inscriptions, have in many particulars strongly confirmed the authentic character of Scripture history. Mr. Loftus is entitled to the merit of having shown that at Shushan, Susa, Sus, and Shush, are various names for the same city; that Elymais—the title by which the Greek and Roman authors designated a portion of ancient Susiana—refers to that region in which Elam, the son of Shem, founded a kingdom; and that the Ahasuerus of Scripture, who married Esther at Shushan, and elevated the Jewish maiden to the Persian throne, is the Xerxes of Grecian history defeated at Marathon and Thermopylæ—whose identity, indeed, has also been proved by the learned Dr. Kitto. Historians and antiquarian critics have widely differed as to the foundation of Susa; and the conquest of Susiana by Ashur bani-pal, King of Assyria, about 660 B.C., is described as the conquest of "Shushan." Mr. Loftus has grappled with all the difficulties surrounding the interesting subject; and, not having space our-elves to present his arguments fully to our readers, we must refer them to chapter xxvii. of his work, in which the early history of Susa is learnedly discussed. But it was one of the richest of the ancient kingdoms of the East is proved by the fact that when Alexander the Great entered the city, after his decisive victory over the Persians at Arbela, he "found in the treasury immense sums of money, with fifty thousand talents of silver in ore and ingots, five thousand quintals of Hermione purple, and numerous other articles a portion of the property which Xerxes carried off from Greece." The fifty thousand talents of silver, estimated in English money amounted to £7,500,000. The quintal weighs about five cwt., and the celebrated Hermione purple is to be computed at the rate of £25 sterling per lb. "The area occupied by the ruins (of Susa) covers an extent of ground three miles and a half in circumference; and, if the numerous small mounds around the great mass be included, spreads over the whole visible plain east the Shaour. To the west of that stream no mounds whatever."

In the neighbourhood of these ruins is the real or reputed tomb of the Prophet Daniel, to which pilgrims resort from all parts of the country. Sir William Ouseley has translated a Persian tradition on this subject, from which it appears that when Abu Musa, A.D. 640, invaded the country, he broke upon the coffin, which contained the mortal remains of Daniel, which were found wrapped in a winding-sheet of gold brocade. The people told the conqueror that the holy man, when living, could always obtain copious showers of rain in a season of drought, and that the people of Irak called him Danyel Hakim, or Daniel the Sage. Abu Musa reported to Omar, Commander of the Faithful, this interesting discovery, and received the following instructions. He was directed "to remove, with due respect and religious reverence, the body of Daniel to some place where the people of Sús could no longer enjoy the possession of it. Abu Musa immediately on receipt of this order obliged the people of Sús to turn the stream, which supplied them with water, from its natural course, then he brought forth the body of Daniel, and, having wrapped another shroud over the gold brocade above described, he commanded that a grave should be made in the dry channel of the river, and therein he deposited the prophet's venerable remains; the grave was then finally secured, and covered with stones of considerable size; the river was restored to its former channel, and the waters of Sús now flow over the body of Daniel." But it so happened that the new place of interment was not equidistant from the two banks; the consequence was that the land nearest to the coffin was fertile, while the more remote was poor and barren. Thus difference was attributed to the bones of the prophet. It led to many fierce disputes, which were at last terminated by the intervention of Sanjar, King of Persia. "He declared (the disputes) to be beneath his dignity in the honour of Daniel, and commanded that the distance between the two banks should be exactly measured, that Daniel's coffin should be deposited in another coffin made of glass, and that it should be suspended from the centre of the bridge by chains of iron. A place of worship was erected on the spot, open to any one who desired to say his prayers, whether he be Jew or Gentile; and the coffin of Daniel is suspended from the bridge to this very day. The King commanded that, in honour of Daniel, nobody should be allowed to fish in the river one mile on each side of the coffin." Such is the account of Benjamin of Tudela (A.D. 1160—1173), and no doubt he saw the suspended coffin. Sanjar died in 1157.

Whoever relishes Layard will be delighted with Loftus. Both have the same spirit of enterprise, the same energy of character, the same love of antiquarian research. Both bring a large amount of learning to their several tasks, and both possess a lively style of narration. Mr. Loftus has travelled over new ground, and has the happy art of almost persuading the reader that he is treading the localities described. In his last chapter he displays high scholarship and acute discrimination in clearing up many difficulties connected with the rivers of Susiana, and especially with the two streams of the Eulæus.

THE IMPROVEMENTS IN FLEET-STREET.

(To the Editor of the Illustrated London News*)*

The long residence of my family in Fleet-street has imbued me not unnaturally, with an interest for the literary history and associations of its neighbourhood. I have, therefore, read with appropriate pleasure your two articles in the Illustrated London News of April 4 on the "Inns of Court" and "Fleet-street," blending so charmingly old things with new. Having said so much, permit me to submit for your consideration a slight correction of your otherwise accurate account. Jacob Robinson, the publisher of Pope and Warburton, did not live, as stated, at No. 16 (now Groom's, the confectioner), but at a shop under the west side of the Inner Temple gateway, now removed, but last occupied by Mr. Piercy, a law-bookseller, twenty years ago. No. 16 was the "Cross Keys," inhabited by Bernard Lintot, between the years 1717 and 1734, the original publisher of Pope's "Homer." Soon after that time it became, what it has since remained, a house celebrated for excellent coffee. Nando's Coffee house, by some confused with Groom's house, was at Skelton's, the hairdresser, No. 17. You are quite correct in stating that Dick's Coffee-house, or a house on that site, was the original printing-office attached to this house. The late Mr. Richard Tottel, barrister to Edward VI., Queens Mary and Elizabeth; but the sign of the Hande and Starre belonged rather to this house than to the printing-office, where Tottel lived, and published the law and other works he printed. We, at the present day, follow the occupation Tottel did in the days of Edward VI.; perhaps you will therefore excuse our fastidiousness in asking you to write law publishers as our designation, instead of law stationers.

I am, Sir, your very obedient servant.

Joshua W. Butterworth, F.S.A.

The British Museum.—We are authorised to state that the present Reading-rooms of the British Museum will not be used for the purposes of study after the 30th inst. During the first week in May, when the Museum will be closed as usual, the Library of Reference will be removed from its present locality to the New Reading-room; and, in order to avoid unnecessary interruption while this operation is being carried on, no strangers will be admitted to the libraries for any purpose whatever. On the 8th of May the New Reading-room will be thrown open to the public generally, who will be allowed to visit it freely until the 16th, after which day it will be devoted exclusively to the use of the readers. This arrangement will involve the loss of a few days to students; but it is anticipated that it will afford much gratification to multitudes who would otherwise have little chance of seeing a building of which, competent judges say, the nation ought to be proud. As the entrance to the new Reading-room is through the front Hall, it will be necessary that readers should bring their tickets of admission with them, until they have become known to the doorkeepers.

The Imperial Washing of Feet.—On the 9th inst., at nine o'clock in the morning, twenty-four old people—twelve men and as many women—who who were dressed in the ancient German costume, were conducted to the Hall of Ceremony (Ceremonien Saal) of the Palace. On their arrival the men were placed on one side of a long table, and the women on the other. As soon as the seniors had taken their seats their Majesties entered and presented to them a great number of dishes, which were brought in trays by the Imperial servers. The Emperor handled the crockery in a masterly way; but the Empress required the assistance of her ladies. After this ceremony had been gone through, the Emperor and Empress, who had attended to the wants of the aged guests, left the hall. The twenty-four large baskets, which were sent to the rooms occupied by the paupers in the almshouse. At ten o'clock the washing of their feet began. It was performed by the Emperor and Empress, the various members of the Imperial family, and the ladies-in-waiting. The women Her Majesty herself took in hand. She took off the left shoe of each, poured water on one of the feet, and then dried it with a towel. Each had been previously provided with a new pair of shoes, and the whole of the twenty-four were clothed in entirely new garments. The ceremony was performed in the most solemn manner. All those who attended it, and especially Her Majesty herself, acted in exactly the same way as the Imperial Consort. Leipsic Journal.

"The Hail no Cabs."—A strange, and to some observers a very disagreeable, incident has occurred in the north-west. A few days since a cow-keeper—or village policeman, of Cawnpore, ran up to another in Futtegkar, and gave him two chupatties. These are indigestible little unleavened cakes, the common food of the poorer classes. He ordered him to make ten more, and give two to each of the five nearest cow-keepers, with the same order. He was obeyed, and in a few hours the whole country was in commotion with chowkeydars running about with these cakes. The wave swept province after province with a speed at which official orders never fly. The magistrates were powerless, and the disputes at this moment are flying westward. Nobody has the least idea what it all means. Some officers fancy it is a ceremony intended to avert the cholera, others hint at treason a view encouraged by the native officials; others talk of it as a trifle—a joke. For much beyond it to be the act of some wealthy fool in pursuance of a vow, but its significance is this. There are some 90,000 policemen in these provinces. If they should purchase a similar dangerous ideas, how perfect is their organisation!—Letter from Calcutta

Hunting in Cheshire.—The Cheshire pack is generally supposed to have been established about two hundred years ago, and nearly all the first hounds were red tan, a colour which is still often to be found in the kennel. I believe that the blue pile, which was first introduced by the Duke of Rutland's Saladin, appears at intervals by breeding. The name of this hound was nearly as dear to the Cheshire huntsmen as Ranger, one of Earl Fitzwilliam's blood, was to the late Tom Carter's father. In fact, when the latter had ridden over for a few days' stay with Lord Scarborough's huntsman, he would put down his glass in an evening, and shout "Ranger! hey! Ranger!" unconsciously for as long as a short hour. Fifty years since the noted Bill Gaff hunted them, and at that time they went one week out of the four, during the season, to the Woore kennels, with a host of scarlets in their train. There was very little bet for Bill that week, but he used to snatch some two or three hours from his pipe and his blue ruin—of which he could drink enough to float a man-of-war—and turn out with his hood piled, and himself "all right," at cockcrow. Sir Peter Warburton, of Arley Hall, was then the master; his hounds were large and slashing, and his grass of ale the best in the county. The runs seem to be of immense length. One day they gave up to the foot of home that Gaff, having a fixture on the forest early next day, took the freshest horse and went back during the night, leaving the wearied whips and hounds to follow at leisure. Having no other resource, he thrust the boiler into a red coat, and the pair found a fox with the second pack and killed him at Bryn-y-pys, after a regular crow-flight of twenty-five miles. Luckily the puppies were out at walk when the madness occurred in the kennel, some fourteen years ago; and, as twenty-five couple were entered the next season, the original blood was kept right. For many weeks watchers, with long leathern gauntlets and dog-tongs, held their dull sentry, night after night, to drag out each hound to his doom the moment he showed any symptoms. Each of them was then confined in a separate kennel; but the subtle poison crept on and on, and at last sixty couple of working hounds, as clever and bony as any in England, had to be destroyed. The shooting days of a noble racing Earl among his thoroughbreds was nothing to the final slaughter; and the poor victims were replaced by fifty couple of Mr. Codrington's hounds.—The Post and the Paddock (Hunting Edition).

SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

[CONCLUDING NOTICE.]

We engrave Mr. Hill's very pleasing picture, "The Fisherman's Return" (109). The distinctive peculiarities and the general picturesqueness of the fisherman and his family on every coast of the world render them an especially favourite subject of poetical description or artistic representation. Attention is also drawn to them by the perilous mode in which they gain their livelihood. Who, on seeing a frail fishing-smack push out hopefully with, perhaps, two or even three generations of one family on board—when, as you imagine, the sky has many threatening indications and the sea is already agitated—who does not feel yearning sympathy with the humblest lives ventured on that treacherous surface? And who does not share in the simple joy of the return—so naturally and faithfully represented in our picture—a joy so heightened and enhanced by all the danger and peril? The fisherman's boat on the beach reminds us of a beautiful passage by Mr. Ruskin. Speaking of the dark flanks of such a boat, he says, they are—

> Just round enough to remind us, in their broad and gradual curves, of the sweep of the green surges they know so well, and of the hours when the old sides of seared timber, all ashine with the sea, plunge and dip in the deep green purity of the mounded waves more joyfully than a deer lies down among the grass of spring, the soft white cloud of foam opening momentarily at the bows, or fading and flying high into the breeze where the seagulls toss and shriek; the joy and beauty of it all the while so mingled with the sense of unfathomable danger, and the human effort and sorrow going on from age to age—waves rolling for ever, and winds moaning for ever, and faithful hearts trusting and sickening for ever, and brave lives dashed away about the rattling beach, like weeds, for ever; and still at the helm of every lonely boat, through starless night and hopeless dawn, His hand who spread the fisher's net over the dust of the Sidonian palaces, and gave into the fisher's hand the keys of the kingdom of heaven.

Mr. Hill has depicted with great skill the hearty natural feelings of the moment of the return in the disposition and employment of each figure; and the frank, unaffected expression on every countenance evinces keen perception of the workings of the features in unsophisticated nature. The whole composition is excellent, and the colouring very dainty in tone and tasteful in arrangement.

The greater number of landscapes in this Exhibition are disfigured by slovenliness of execution and want of finish—defects which are explained, in most cases, by the number of contributions sent by each artist. The best landscape in the gallery is certainly Mr. Sever's "Salmon Leap on the Conway" (178). The white light in the picture is admirably managed. It describes the diverse form and the variegated colour of the boulders which obstruct the stream and force it into petty fury with the greatest truth. The discrimination of the hues of these boulders, indeed, evinces a very fine eye for colour. The atmospheric clearness is also very happy, and the general effect equal to the truth in particulars. "Scene on the Severn at Framylode" (628) is likewise full of strength and breadth.

Mr. Clint's "Recollection of Sunset on the Thames" (80) may be true to the effect sometimes near London; but such a smoky, misty recollection was scarcely worth preservation. We do not ask for

> The light that never was on sea or land,
> The consecration and the poet's dream.

But we do ask for a brighter sunset than this, and we contend that such sunsets are to be seen even in the "Pool." Another picture by this artist, "The Cove of Cork" (636), is an extraordinary contrast to the last in brightness and clearness, although the touch is a little heavy in the distance.

"Evening on the Llugwy, from the Bridge, Bettws-y-Caed" (195), by Mr. Pettitt, is very carefully painted. The stream struggles and foams among the slate rocks, and the evening rays gild here and there the spray and the crests of the foam very naturally. Still the general tone is somewhat horny, and the picture looks like the work of a foreign artist—that is to say, it has not English freshness of colour. In "Brougham Castle" (309) there is a very bold and strange, yet we believe very truthful, effect, resulting from the sun having set behind the castle. No. 254 is also an admirable picture.

With the mention of Mr. Boddington's name our readers will at once expect "Summer Morning on the Thames," or "Summer Evening on the Thames;" and they will not be disappointed, for there are both in this Exhibition, and an "Autumn Evening" besides. Our artist has, however, in "Approaching Storm near Marlow on Thames" (550), departed from his own small circle of effects in which he certainly reigns almost supreme. His regular set pallet for sunny effects he has darkened and sullied to represent the thunder-clouds, but without any startling success. In "A Summer's Noon, Llyn Gwernen, North Wales" (223), Mr. Boddington is quite at home. The flood of light from the sky is unimitable; the foreground, however, does not appear sufficiently lit up.

Mr. G. Cole, in No. 541, comes very near Cuyp. His cattle are ruminating in that golden evening hour which often sets nobler animals "chewing the cud of sweet and bitter fancies." The long rays streak the green sward with a soft light like the down on a peach. No. 13, "Landscape and Cattle," though a much larger, and also a fine, picture, is not quite so sunny and luminous.

CLOSE OF THE HUNTING SEASON: MENDING THE GAPS.—DRAWN BY JOHN LEECH.—(SEE PAGE 364.)

There is much peaceful stillness and tenderness about the distance in two works by Mr. Tennant—Nos. 31 and 617.

Mr. West, in No. 158, has represented one of the thousand water falls of Norway with apparently great felicity. The work bears the impress of reality in every part. The boiling, smoking rush of the mountain torrent—clear and pure because it has not yet reached any of the muddy impurities of the valley—and the thin transparency of the atmosphere, are both admirably depicted. This is the kind of scene in which Mr. West chiefly distinguishes himself. In several other works by this artist we notice that his foliage is somewhat heavy [illegible] and his level water rather woolly.

Mr. [illegible]'s Recollections of the Rhine" (84) are, it must be confessed, rather [illegible]. But "Converted" (608) proves that the artist can be charmingly clear and distinct. The drifting clouds and the cutting horizon convey the impression of wind very forcibly.

The handling in Mr. Zeitter's works is on the wrong side of boldness. We do not deny that a great deal is expressed by a few flourishes of the brush, but a great deal more should be aimed at by a conscientious artist.

In the Kentish Marshes with Cattle" (245), by Mr. Wainewright, is fresh and pleasing in effect, though a rather empty picture, and lamentably deficient in finish and painstaking.

A large picture by Mr. W. Shayer, "A Devonshire Fisherman and Grandchildren" (166), importunately demands the attention of visitors, but we fear they will find not much to admire in it. The light, and shade, and grouping, are inartistic; and the colour, particularly the purple of the clouds, not natural.

Two pictures by Mr. Henzell deserve notice, and also the works of the following artists viz., Messrs. F. C. Ward, Mogford, Wilson, Taylor, Kennedy, Morris, and Gosling.

We have incidentally mentioned one or two water-colour drawings; but a few more deserve particular attention. By the veteran, Mr. Aaron Penley, we have "The Sun's Last Gleam, Loch Dennacher, near the Trossachs" (672), with all his well-known wash of warm air and calm reach of water. "Schoolgirl" (837), by Mr. Ayling, has much sweetness of expression, and, for water-colour painting, has great breadth. The water, in particular, in No. 655, by Mr. Taylor, is excellently painted. Mr. Dobbin has well represented the lacework intricacy of the spire of Antwerp Cathedral in No. 662. In conclusion, "The Lover of Art" (962), by Mr. Chapman, is full of promise. Karl Hartmann's "Pifferari" (887) are very forcibly painted. Mr. Ingle-field's Views are very interesting. Mr. Deane's "St. Paul's" is a capital piece of truth; and Mr. Hayller's "Sketch of Character" is full of that quality. But we beg pardon—place aux dames. Miss Macirone's picture, No. 673, decidedly deserves a better place; and Mrs. Withers's pictures of still-life, &c., are full of her customary carefulness.

THE FOREIGN FACTORIES AT CANTON.

One of the results of the war with China has been the demolition of the Foreign Factories at Canton. They have already been, in part, illustrated in our Journal; but the View engraved upon page [illegible] shows the entire range of the Factories, copied for a picture painted by a native artist for Captain Hall (then of the Nemesis), who has obligingly placed this View at our disposal.

The factories at Canton have often been described; and, as an accompaniment to the present view, which may be regarded as a [illegible] of a large extent of property which has fallen a prey to the vengeance of the Cantonese authorities, we cannot do better than quote the following outline of the factories, from Sir John Davis's excellent work "The Chinese":—

> Among the most respectable-looking buildings of Canton, inasmuch as the fronts at least are concerned, are the foreign factories, which occupy a very limited extent along the bank of the river in the south-western suburb. The confined state of these, and their utter inadequacy to accommodate an increased number of traders, at the same time that the Government refuses any increase of space, is a subject which must very soon be debated with the local authorities. These factories, together with a large portion of the suburb in which they are situated, are built on a muddy flat, which has been gained from the river, and they are consequently erected upon wooden piles, only just above high-water mark. The heavy rains during the summers of 1833 and 1834 produced [illegible] ings of the river, which inundated the whole of the European factories to the height of several feet on their ground-floors. Boats plied from door to door along the streets, and from one European residence to another; and a net was seen to be cast for fish in the midst of a Hong merchant's grounds.
> It may, perhaps seem incredible that the whole frontage of the buildings, in which foreigners of all nations are shut up together, for the prosecution of their trading business at Canton, does not exceed between seven and eight hundred feet. Each front, of which there are about thirteen, extends backwards about a hundred and thirty yards into a long narrow lane or thoroughfare, on each side of which, as well as over arches that cross it, are the confined abodes of the English, French, Dutch, Americans, Parsees and others. Many of these spend a large portion, if not the whole of their lives here in the worship of Mammon, without the [illegible] and with no recreation but the jingling of dollars [illegible] examined by the Chinese [illegible]. Many years back a considerable number of flags, as the D[illegible] and American were hoisted in front of the factories, besides [illegible] but for the last quarter of a century these three, with the French tricolor, which was erected soon after the Revolution of 1830, have been the only foreign ensigns [illegible].
> The European factories are [illegible] the word Hong being also [illegible] blishment or warehouse [illegible] or [illegible] Hong [illegible] which serves to surround a portion of the city wall as well as to [illegible] that part of the town. This is crossed with a single arch, by a narrow street at the back of the factories, that leads to the warehouses of the several Hong merchants, all of them communicating with the river by wooden or stone stairs, from which the tea and other merchandize is shipped.

Memorabilia,

LITERARY, ANTIQUARIAN, SCIENTIFIC, AND ARTISTIC.

"A little chink may let in much light."—OLD PROVERB.

ROYAL JEWELS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

AN interesting letter from Mr. FitzPatrick, commencing the "Memorabilia" in the paper of March 21, on the subject of the "Royal Jewels of Great Britain," induces me to forward to you a copy of a singularly curious document that I found among a few old papers in the library of the late Mr. Britton, whose architectural and antiquarian collections, in accordance with his wishes, will be sold by auction in Wellington-street, during the ensuing month, by my partner and myself. Not only is the document one of high historical interest in connection with the subject of the Royal Insignia of England; but as a literary curiosity it is perhaps more refreshing inasmuch as the most prominent signature affixed to it is that of George Wither, the most voluminous poetical author of his time, his works being dated from 1613 to 1667, and extending to above one hundred. He was a great Puritan, and taking an active part in the rebellion he raised a troop of horse, to which he was appointed Major, and not long after Cromwell made him Major-General of the Parliamentary Army in the county of Surrey. I have before me a copy of a reprint, by my friend Mr. Pulham (one of the most enthusiastic collectors of the works of Wither), of a very rare poem, one of the most singular of the Poet's productions. It is entitled "A Single Si Quis," and was published in 1648, though without the date appearing in it. It consisted of only two quarto leaves, and the only copy I have ever seen was attached to a copy of his "Opobalsamum Angliæanum," 1646, which was sold in the Heber Library, in 1834 (part iv., lot 3013), but not mentioned in the catalogue—it having been accidentally overlooked. My friend Mr. Pulham states in the preface to his reprint of the poem, that it was written by George Wither, "in consequence of the neglect which one of the author's petitions met with from the Puritan Parliament;" and that "he was appointed with Colonel Humphreys and seven others as trustees to ferret out, secure, value, and sell the jewels, wearing apparel, and other effects of the unfortunate King Charles and his family." The last sentence, John Humfrey, was no doubt a Colonel named, though differently spelt. I will only add that the original document consists of a small folio sheet of vellum, and that the autograph signature of Poet George Wither is of the utmost rarity. I remain, Sir, your obedient servant, S. LEIGH SOTHEBY, The Woodlands, Norwood.

15 JUNII, 1632 At the Committes of Trustees for the sale of the late Kings Goodes. These are to certifie all those whome it may concerne that Sir Henry Mildmay Kt Master of the Jewell House hath caused to bee delivered unto us (according to an Act of Parliament for sale of the late King, Queene, and Princes Goodes) Two Crownes called the King and Queenes crownes, with a third called the Crowne of King Edward the Sixth, As also the gold and Silver Plate and divers Vessells of Cristall, and Aggats belonging to the aforesaid, valued distinctly according to such particulars as have beene returned by us in a Duplicate, or Duplicates to the Counsell of State, and amounting in the whole to above £13000 0 0. ### NOTES.

SHAKSPEARE CUP.—I have read with much interest your article on the Shakspeare Cup. I too have a Shakspeare Cup, with the history of which I will trouble you. When the Incumbent of Stratford, in the plenitude of his taste, cut down Shakspeare's mulberry tree, Mr. Sharpe, of Stratford, obtained a part of it, out of which he turned a cup, which he afterwards sold to Mr. Garrick. This cup, at Mr. Garrick had a Shakspeare Cup presented to him by the Corporation of Stratford (qy., whether this cup be that which was sold at Mr. Berry's sale?), he gave to his nephew, on whose decease it became the property of his widow. This lady was a favourite singer at the Newcastle theatre, and having received attentions from Mr. John Erwling Wilson, of the Customs, of this port, she presented the cup to him, which he retained as a precious relic during the remainder of his life. On Mr. Wilson's death the cup was sold to Mr. William Burrett, a Gateshead silversmith in this town, who afterwards sold it to me. When I obtained the cup it was a plain unadorned vessel; but I have had it lined with silver and placed silver shields on its side with the armorial insignia of Shakspeare, et John of Gaunt, Ralph Neville, Earl of Westmoreland, Harry Hotspur, and Owen Glendower, all of whom are immortalised in the plays of our great dramatist. On the rim I have put my own crest and an Old English F, and added Garrick's own verses:

Behold! this fair goblet was carved from the tree
Which, O, my sweet Shakspeare! was planted by thee.

When I have a party of literary friends at dinner I use this cup as a loving cup, and it never fails to awaken the most pleasing recollections in the minds of us all.—JOHN FENWICK, F.S.A., Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

VULGAR ERRORS.—The following cutting, yellow with age, is from a newspaper of the year 1816. As some of the vulgar errors referred to still exist, a revival of the old paragraph may instruct some and amuse many.—W. J. FITZ-PATRICK.

"VULGAR ERRORS.—It is difficult to account for many of the prevailing vulgar errors with regard to what is supposed to be law. Such are, that the body of a debtor may be taken into execution after his death. Other vulgar errors are, that the old statutes have prohibited the planting of vineyards or the use of sawing-mills. It is supposed likewise to be penal to open a coal-mine or to kill a crow within five miles of London, as also to shoot with a wind gun or to carry a dark lantern. That the law has set a price on the head of the hedgehog may also be classed among errors; for notions, for no such law is now in being or ever did exist in this country. To these vulgar errors may be added, the supposing that the King signs the death-warrant (as it is called) for the execution of a criminal, as also that a woman marrying a man under the gallows will save him from the execution. It is also a prevailing error, that those who are born at sea belong to Stepney parish. Another vulgar error is, that a surgeon or butcher (from the barbarity of their business) may be challenged as jurors. Among the ignorant it is supposed that there is a statute which obliges the owners of asses to crop their ears, lest the length of them should frighten the horses which they meet on the road. The notion that in order completely to disinherit the heir-at-law his ancestors must bequeath him a shilling is also founded in error. It is a very prevailing vulgar error also, that every Bishop, before he accepts a Bishopric which is offered him, affects a maiden coyishness, and answers nolo episcopari. Another error is, that first cousins may marry, and second cousins may not. This paradox arose from confounding the provisions of the civil and canon law; by the former of which first cousins are permitted to marry, but by the latter second cousins are prohibited. Two other additional vulgar errors are, that when a man designs to marry a woman that is in debt if he takes her from the hands of the priest, clothed only in her shift, it is supposed that he is not liable to her engagements. The second, that selling a wife in the public market, with a halter about her neck, will free a man thereafter from the responsibility of a husband."

A QUAINT EPITAPH.—The following inscription from a tombstone is curious, and may be interesting to some of your readers: Attached to the north wall of the church of Grade, in the Meneage or Lizard district of Cornwall, is a slab, round the edge of which are the words "Here lyeth the body of Hugh Mason, Gent., who departed this life in the feare of God, the third day of December, 1671, and of the age sixty-five." His arms are sculptured at the top, a fess between three griffin's-heads erased. In the centre of the slab are the following lines, which countenance the tradition still prevailing in the parish, that he was a Roundhead; or, as some say, a Regicide. He was evidently no friend of the Church; and it appears he chose to be buried on the north side of the church, to avoid payment of the customary fee:—

"Why here?—why not?—'tis all one ground,
And here none will my dust confound.
My Saviour lay where no one did,
Why not, neither as his Head?
No quire to sing, no bells to ring.
Why, sirs, thus buried was my King.
I grudge the fashion of this day
To flat this Hillock or take lay.
Though nothing now of me be seene,
I hope my name and bed is greene."

QUERIES

"RULES AND ORDINANCES."—A leaf of an old book came into my possession by chance, a short time ago, with the above heading. On reading it I found that it contained the following paragraph:—

"That no person shall use or drive any cart for hire in the city of London, or the liberties thereof, without license for that purpose first obtained from the Governors of Christ's Hospital; and that the owner of every such cart, car, or car-room, shall pay to the Governors of Christ's Hospital the ancient acquittance fee of the yearly rent of 17s. 4d. for every cart, car, or car-room, which is or shall be hereafter licensed by them; and that the owner of every such cart, car, or car-room, shall likewise pay to the Governors of Christ's Hospital 20s., as hath been anciently paid to them, on every change or alteration of the property of any such cart, car, or car-room; and likewise the sum of 3s. 6d., the accustomed fee taken for every licence granted to any cart, car, or car-room, by the said Governors of Christ's Hospital. And if any one shall offend in the premises, on being convicted thereof before any justice of the peace of the city of London, shall forfeit for every offence the sum of 40s. That all carts already licensed, or which shall hereafter be licensed, by the Governors of Christ's Hospital, shall stand and ply for hire in the places already appointed, or hereafter to be appointed, by the Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen of this City, or by the sessions in London."

Doubtless either yourself or some of your readers will oblige me by stating when this law was made, if it be still in existence, and also why the Governors of Christ's Hospital should have been invested with the power of granting such licenses.—AN OLD BLUE, Jersey.

HOME-GROWN TOBACCO.—Tobacco, it appears, could be grown in this country, but an old law, passed in the reign of Charles I. or Charles II., forbids its cultivation. Can any of your legal readers inform me why the Act was passed? I have heard it asserted that it was owing to smoking leading to drinking, drinking to jaundice, jaundice to death. The Act still remains in force, but an experiment might be tried on a small scale with the plant, as I am inclined to think the home-grown weed would smoke much milder than the Virginian or Havannah.—THE FORBIDDEN PLANT, Palmerstown, Ireland.

ANSWERS.

WHERE DOES THE DAY BEGIN?—Your Correspondent "T. J. Buckton" has completely failed to apprehend the point of difficulty in this question. The knot of the problem is this: there must be some place on the earth's surface, some parallel of longitude, at which it is impossible to determine whether a given sunrise belongs to a certain day or the day following. That it is so is mathematically demonstrable. At London, suppose the sun rises at a certain hour on Monday. At a place fifteen degrees east there was sunrise an hour earlier, but still Monday morning. We may proceed thus till we come to some particular parallel, for example, that through the antipodes. At the antipodes then Monday commences twelve hours earlier than at London. But again, we know that for the same reason as before Monday commences later to the west of London—fifteen degrees to each hour. Therefore, at the antipodes, Monday commences twelve hours later than at London. Whatever way we may decide concerning this particular parallel, it is clear that there must be some parallel where there is an abrupt change of day—some where we may either call it Monday (looking on the sun as coming towards London to commence Monday) or Sunday (looking on the sun as coming from London, where it was producing Sunday). We therefore would repeat the question of your former correspondent: Where is this unique parallel of longitude?—S. L. B., Trinity College, Dublin.

Observing that this question is now under discussion in your columns (a question which occurred to myself years ago, and for which I have never been able to meet with a satisfactory solution), I am anxious that your correspondents should be aware what the real difficulty of the question is. According to the statement of "T. J. Buckton, Lichfield," the day is always commencing at some point or other on the globe; so that if one could travel round it in twenty-four hours, arriving everywhere exactly at midnight by the time of the place, we should find each place in a state of transition of name. But if for midnight we substitute mid-day we are at once involved in a difficulty. The case may be briefly stated thus:—Suppose yourself to start from London at mid-day on Tuesday, and to travel with the sun, thus reaching London again at mid-day on Wednesday. If at the end of every hour you ask the English residents in the place you have reached the name of the day, you must at last reach some place where the answer changes to Wednesday. But at that moment it is still Tuesday (one p.m.), at the place you left an hour before. Thus you find two places within an hour in time of each other, using for the same day, and that not at midnight, when it would be natural to do so, but when one place is at mid-day, and the other at one p.m. Whether two such places exist, and whether, if they do exist, any communication can take place between them without actual violence being the result, I shall not pretend to say; but I shall be glad to see any rational solution suggested for the difficulty as I have put it.—A MATHEMATICAL TUTOR, Oxford.

PATRIOTISM AND THE UNBURIED ONE.—I beg to state, for the information of the gentleman making the inquiry, that it is an undoubted fact that human bodies have been known to be so preserved in St. Michan's vaults. I myself saw four bodies there about twelve years ago. I am not quite sure that they are yet to be seen; I am rather inclined to think that they are not. Two of these bodies were those of the "Sheareses," who were rather notorious in the insurrection which took place in this city something more than half a century ago, and forfeited their lives to the State. Their heads, having been cut off, were laid in the coffin with their bodies, and were placed at their feet when I saw them. At about the time of the recent attempt at insurrection in this country—viz., in the year 1848, some friends, or sympathising patriots, from America I believe, claimed their bodies, and had them coaxed up in lead coffins, and either restored them, or covered, to the vaults, or had them interred elsewhere, but which I cannot at this moment tell. Another body was that of a gentleman, said to have been there nearly one hundred years. I observed upon his wrists the remains of lace "ruffles," in which I have been calling. The remains of body was that of a lady, said to have been also a very long time there. Her finger-nails, teeth, and hair were in excellent preservation. The bodies preserve their general outlines of form, the skin looking like old tanned and shrivelled leather, while all the interior substance and framework appeared to have wasted away. There was something sadly depressing and humiliating in their appearance, and I felt the vaults sorrowfully impressed with the scene. I regret very much that I cannot give as decided an opinion as I have been calling "the cause" of this marvellous preserving quality. All I can say is that it is commonly attributed to some latent antiseptic property in the soil of the vaults' floors, which is a "compos" of very dry pebble limestone and gravel.—J. M'ALLISTER, 17, Charlemont-place, Dublin.

KING BOMBA.—The sapient King of Naples was first named Bomba by his Sicilian subjects, during the Sicilian Revolution of 1848-49, from his having "bombarded" or "shelled" (Bomba meaning shell) Messina, Palermo, and other cities of Sicily. At Catania, and other places, the word "Bomba" was stamped on dollars bearing the head of the present King; and these dollars were current during the revolution, but called in and destroyed on the King obtaining possession again of Sicily.—ANGLO-SICILIAN.

LOCHEAD DALLAS is thanked for the beautiful problems forwarded for our disposal.

VALENTYNE.—We were misinformed. The amateurs of Cordial have never played with those of Aix-la-Chapelle, but they have recently been engaged in a game by correspondence with the celebrated Anderssen, and, much to their credit, succeeded in drawing it against that formidable opponent.

OLD STAGER. THE POPPONE NOVELTY IN THE ARRANGEMENT OF THE CHESS PIECES.—We entertain a different opinion. The suggestion of our Correspondent, "R.," to remove the positions of the Bishops and Knights before commencing a game, for the purpose of originating new openings and combinations, appears to us eminently worthy of consideration. It interferes with none of the established rules of the game, neither adds to nor diminishes the power of any of the pieces, nor extracts from the natural [illegible] of the ordinary manner of playing, but it has the advantage of [illegible] must spring from it having a completely simplified and novel form of Chess as to [illegible] better test of natural capacity for the game than the old mode of arranging the men affords. With the Knights and Bishops transposed at the outset, a player is dependent solely upon his own resources for the development of his game. Memory will afford less assistance. He has no convenient "Handbook" or "Chess Manual" whereon to crave for the first ten moves in attack or defence; he must invent, and not borrow. In the old game, on the other hand, every opening has been subjected to such a process by analytical [illegible] for the [illegible] moves, the first few moves [illegible] as the arrangements.

CHESS IN THE METROPOLIS

The following brilliant partie was the deciding game in an interesting Match just concluded between Mr. [illegible]ARRER the Prussian player, and Mr. BIRD, an English Amateur, of whose originality and boldness of conception we have often had occasion to speak. The interest of the hour when the moves were transmitted to us must plead as an apology for the brevity of the annotation.

READING AND BERKSHIRE CHESS-CLUB.—The Annual Chess Meeting, in connection with this club, is to be held on the 22nd inst., in the large Reading-room, at the New Public Hall, London street.

Besides a vast number of printed books, many of them of great rarity and value, destroyed by the late fire at Messrs. Allen and Co.'s, of Leadenhall-street, several antique Oriental manuscripts have either been consumed, or so charred by the fire as to be valueless.

MURDER OF A MAIL-CART DRIVER IN FRANCE.—Some persons, three or four evenings ago, proceeding along the road which leads from AUXERRE to Vermanton, were astonished to find the mail-cart which plies between the two towns standing in the road, with the driver lying dead, and the letter-bags abstracted. The man had been shot through the head as he was driving along the road. The man's gold watch, chain, and purse were found on him. The affair has created quite a sensation in the department of the Yonne.—Gallignani's Messenger

No. 855.—VOL. XXX.] SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1857. [WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE.

PARTIES IN THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

In the Parliament called together in 1852, under the auspices of the Earl of Derby and Mr. Disraeli, there were at first but two distinct and clearly-definable parties—those of Free-Trade and Protection. But, as time wore on, Protection gave up the ghost, and was buried, with none to weep for it. The war against Russia shortly afterwards burst out, and parties assumed new shapes and modifications. From the original two they split into no less than five, more or less clearly marked. There was, in the first place, the great Liberal party, which, though without a recognised leader, formed the majority. Secondly, there was the Conservative party, yielding a sulky allegiance to Mr. Disraeli. Thirdly, there was the small but most respectable party of the old Whigs, with Lord John Russell at its head. Fourthly, there was the party commonly called Peelites—an offshoot from Conservatism, and belonging naturally, and of right, to that body, which allowed Mr. Gladstone to be its spokesman. Fifthly, there was the Manchester party—strong in the courage of John Bright, and the eloquence of Richard Cobden. The Parliament thus constituted had but one task before it; but it was a task that required all its patriotism, courage, foresight, and public spirit. Two of the five parties into which it was divided set themselves systematically against the prosecution of the war; though it taxed all the energies of the nation, engaged all its sympathies, awakened all the hopes of the strong that England would be victorious; all the fears of the timid that she would be defeated in the struggle, and made itself be felt in every homestead as the one great question of our time. But the "Peelites" and the "Manchester Peace Party" neither understood the war nor their countrymen. They originally gained their position by doing work when work was to be done; for it was they who repealed the Corn-laws. In the same way they lost their position, by refusing to work, when work—strong, sturdy, and hearty—against Russia was the one thing needful. Their countrymen no sooner had an opportunity of testifying at the hustings their opinion of the conceit, impracticability, and political cowardice of the "Peelites" and "Manchester Peacemen" than the whole party were, with a few individual exceptions, consigned to private life—some for a while only; some, it is to be presumed and hoped, for the term of their natural existence. For pronouncing this judgment the public has been accused of ingratitude and of ostracism; and Mr. Bright, and even Mr. Cobden, has been compared to an Aristides—too good and too just to be loved or even tolerated by his countrymen. But, unless one service, in which thousands of people took part, is to outweigh all possible disservice in a public man; unless a member of Parliament, because he has once done right, is to be allowed to go wrong without let or hindrance for ever afterwards, we do not see how the public can be accused either of ingratitude or of injustice in refusing Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright a place in the new Parliament. In their youthful days they did right, and the public rewarded them. In their maturer days, when they should have known better, they did wrong, and the public refused to reward them any further. Where in this case is the injustice or the ingratitude?

The Parliament of 1857, relieved of those whose want of a national policy and a sound judgment rendered necessary the dissolution of the Parliament of 1852, may be divided into the three normal parties of Liberals, Conservatives, and Whigs. At the head of the first, with a large majority at his back, is Lord Palmerston; Mr. Disraeli, with a strong and compact minority, leads the second party; and Lord John Russell, with a still smaller minority, which may possibly grow into a majority, leads the third. The other statesmen and orators who aspire to sway the councils of the nation, and who do not clearly belong to either of these three great and time-honoured divisions, will speedily have to decide whether they will join the Whigs or the Conservatives; for good Liberals they are not likely to become. Mr. Gladstone will, perhaps, make common cause with Mr. Disraeli—Sir James Graham, if we may judge from his speeches at Carlisle, will unite his fortunes with those of Lord John Russell.

Domestic reforms always follow great and long-protracted wars, and that may be one reason why Lord Aberdeen and the statesmen who shared his timidity in 1853 and 1854 were so anxious to bring the war to a premature and unnatural conclusion. Already the hostilities in Canton, which were the immediate moving causes of the dissolution of the last Parliament, have ceased to be the question of the day; and the word Reform, the mere mention of which, three years ago, used to be scouted as inopportune by men of all parties, and turned into ridicule by powerful daily newspapers, is on the lips of all the great Parliamentary leaders. Lord Palmerston is to be a Reformer, though he has said but little on the subject. Lord John Russell is to be a Reformer, both from policy and from conviction; and Mr. Disraeli is to be a Reformer, specially charged with the conservation of Tory influence, and with the destruction of all rotten boroughs belonging to Whig patrons. But, although Lord Palmerston has the majority—although his manly foreign policy has made him the favourite of the nation—although his energy during the late war saved the country from disgrace, and entitled him to the gratitude of his contemporaries, as it will secure for him the approbation of history—it is not he but Lord John Russell who has become the master of the situation. The War was Lord Palmerston's question. Reform in Parliament is the question of Lord John Russell. The extent to which reform is to be carried depends far more upon the noble Lord the member for London than upon the noble Lord the member for Tiverton. If it depended altogether upon Lord Palmerston, we may be assured that very little would be made to suffice. The antagonism which at present exists between these distinguished persons is the best security of the public that the new Reform Bill will be so framed and elaborated as to fit the necessities of the year 1857 as completely as the first Reform Act fitted those of 1832. The public can but gain by their rivalry. Lord Palmerston's reputation is made; and, were he to cease to be Minister to-morrow, he would occupy a large and a bright page in his country's annals. Lord John Russell has yet to make a reputation as splendid. He had an opportunity and he lost it. He was in power for six years, and he damaged both his party and his name by the inglorious use he made of splendid opportunities, by narrow-minded nepotism in his appointments, and by a general inefficiency and weakness in every department of his Government. Fortune and his own skill in playing the game of politics have once more given him a chance; and if Lord Palmerston is to retain, or Lord John Russell to regain, power by the favour of the people, it is on the Reform question that the favour is to be won, and that the battle is to be fought. The stagnation of domestic politics has lasted too long. It is good for the political health of a free country that there should be a clear, broad, question of home affairs, and of popular rights, for the people and Parliament to discuss. Such a question is that of Reform; and the statesman who proposes the best measure, whether it be Lord Palmerston or Lord John Russell, will render the best service to the nation. It is not unlikely that Lord Palmerston will be the man; but, if he be, the result, we cannot help thinking, will be mainly due to the position assumed by Lord John Russell. And what of Mr. Disraeli? Nothing, literally nothing. He has but to look on with his party, and abide the issue.

VISIT OF THE SULTAN TO THE "ROYAL ALBERT."

WE have been favoured by an eye-witness with the accompanying sketch of the visit of the Sultan to the Royal Albert while in the Bosphorus, on the 28th ult. The Sultan was received at the entry port on the middle deck by the Admiral (Lord Lyons), Ambassador, Pachas, and Captains of the fleet. He was conducted to the upper deck by the Ambassador, who was obliged to help him up the ladders. He wore the fez, with a button on the top, a loose overcoat, the collar and cuffs of which were a mass of diamonds worth about £50,000. He threw open his coat so as to show the Ribbon and Star of the Garter, telling the Admiral that he felt proud to be able to wear it before so many brave soldiers and sailors. A chair was brought out for him, which he refused, saying in French, which he speaks fairly, "Je ne suis pas fatigué." After the usual complimentary speeches had been exchanged the Admiral conducted him to the cabin, and, after a short rest, he again came on deck, and walked forward. While on deck this time the Sultan had evidently got over his nervousness, and laughed and chatted a good deal, apparently taking considerable interest in all he saw On returning to the Admiral's cabin he requested the Admiral, Ambassador, and Pachas to be seated—a thing that, I believe, has never before taken place. The Sultan then begged Lord Lyons to inform her Majesty the Queen how grateful he felt for the prompt assistance that had been rendered to his country, and for having sent such a man as the Admiral to be one of the defenders of Turkey. He afterwards paid the Admiral a very handsome compliment. His Majesty said "I loved you when I first saw you, and that affection and regard has since been increased by the nobleness of your conduct; and I feel that it is no small thing to come on board such a ship to see such a man; and I trust that, if again England become the defender of Turkey, your Sovereign may choose you, if your services can be spared, to again command the fleet. And I hope that you may long live to adorn the profession of which you are such a bright ornament."

THE FRENCH GUNPOWDER PLOT.—A person, whose name it is but necessary to mention, a silk-weaver by trade, and a fanatic in politics, conceived the notion of blowing up the Emperor while he was sitting in his box at the Théâtre Français. The modern Catesby proceeded to London to communicate his plan to persons from whom he expected to receive encouragement and assistance. After a conference with them he returned to France, and soon after again repaired to London to arrange the final operations. In the mean time one of his London friends, believing he had reason to suspect that the French Catesby was in reality a secret agent of the French authorities sent to entrap him, gave information to the English police. When "Catesby" heard of the fact he became furious, and, anticipating the denunciation, returned hastily to Paris, revealed the plot to the French authorities, and denounced his accomplices. He, with about thirty persons, was at once taken into custody. The affair is now in course of investigation, and will, in due time, be brought before the Correctional Police Court, when, no doubt, the concoctor of the plan will be produced as the principal witness. It seems that a plan of the part of the theatre where the Emperor is wont to sit, as of the external parts contiguous, was drawn. Barrels of powder were to be deposited immediately under the box, a train laid on, which was to be carried outside, and the mine was to be sprung while the attention of the Emperor and the audience was absorbed by the usual representations. The accomplice of the chief conspirator declared that he was nothing more than a police spy, but the police authorities disclaim him altogether. Letter from Paris.

IMPROVEMENTS IN MADRID.—The Madrid Gazette of the 14th contains a Royal decree which authorises the Minister of Public Works to come to an understanding with the municipality, the provincial deputation, and the ministries, for the aggrandisement and embellishment of the capital, by inclosing within the walls a large tract of ground, and laying it out in streets, parks, promenades, and by cutting wide streets in the city, improving the river, building railway stations, &c.

OVER THE WATER.

THERE are hundreds of curious facts, many points of historic and literary interest, lively anecdotes and social gossip, and by-way stories illustrative of the times, which English readers would be glad to have within their reach. New books appear in Paris, in Vienna, Berlin, and Turin—and books, too, worth studying—the titles of which never reach London. How many English readers know that M. de Fouchez de Careil has returned to Paris from Hanover with some unpublished MSS. by Liebnitz? Yet surely the fact is important. These MSS. are said to include two Dialogues of Plato, translated and annotated; letters on Descartes; letters to Hobbes, Fradella, and Arnaud; and the author's life and portrait, executed by himself? Do we turn towards Turin. Here we find among new Italian books "Reform in Italy in the Sixteenth Century," in which we have a complete gallery of the Italian martyrs who have fought against the influence of the Pope;" M. François Trinchera's "Vocabulary of the Italian Language;" and the Count Alexandre Bianco de Saint Porion's "Political and Military History of Piedmont, from the year 1000 to the Peace of Paris in 1856." Nor should M. L. Vigo's "Popular Songs of Sicily" be left unnoticed. The labour alone which this author has devoted to his work is worthy of notice in these days when scissors too often take the place of serious study, and wafers rest too often upon the writer's lip. M. Vigo has visited the chief towns of Sicily; and he presents to his readers the soft songs of Palermo, Messina, Sambuca, Ribera, Novara, Bronte, Syracuse, &c. The Sicilians should be grateful to him, just as the Parisians should be grateful to Prince Napoleon for the two living specimens of the Patos utaudus which he has presented to the Paris Museum of Natural History, together with some blue foxes (Isatis), which he brought home from his journey in the north. The account of this journey, on which some well-known scientific men are working hard, and which is to be a costly work, is already in course of translation into English. What the Prince can have to tell after so rapid a journey over paths so beaten is not the question. The main point is that a Prince edits. Besides, if there be no Royal road to learning, there may possibly be an Imperial one.

We have some new journals to welcome from over the water. The subscribers to the hundred cannons for Alessandria have carried their enthusiasm to the point of establishing a newspaper in Piedmont called I Cento Cannoni. The promoters would possibly have pleased their political friends better by buying powder with the money they have resolved to spread abroad in the shape of paper and print. So many papers, however, are cropping up under the prosperous auspices of the King of Sardinia that we can only give the name of a recent Turin speculation La Staffetta (The Post). Nor does the reign of Napoleon III. appear to be less fruitful of papers—chiefly, it must be confessed, devoted to what has been called a brouhaha literature. The Tam-Tam, the Tintamarre, and the Petit Tintamarre are familiar only to the more inveterate café frequenters; nor can people who value the purity of English journalism wish to see a single line of these purveyors of brouhaha sentiments reach London. Social scandal, spiced with equivocal bon-mots, may be amusing to the Quartier Latin; but, happily, the mixture does not agree with the British constitution.

Good acts should warm an artist's welcome. Let us record an act of generosity on the part of Madame Ristori. She lately sent the sum of £80 to the Florentine Society for the Encouragement of Theatrical Art. This sum is to be distributed thus:—A prize of £40 to the author of the best Italian comedy offered in competition to this society; and a prize of £20, and two of £10, to the three leading scholars of the dramatic school founded at Florence by M. Berti. These helps to art by artists merit public acknowledgment, and they generally receive it, although we English must appear icy cold to singers or actors who come to us from the south. Imagine the recall of a composer before the curtain thirty times. This signal effort of enthusiasm—this pulmonary triumph—was actually achieved, on the second representation of M. Pera's "Adriana Lecouvreur" at Rome. The happy maestro made his thirtieth bow in one evening. Nor are pecuniary rewards to composers given with a niggard hand. A short time ago Meyerbeer married his only daughter to a Prussian Colonel, and gave her, as a marriage portion, not £2000 a year, not a landed estate, but simply the copyright of "Robert le Diable" and "L'Africaine." The former, it is asserted, is worth to the composer's representative £280 per night!

The princely residence M. Feuld, Minister of State, is erecting in the Faubourg St. Honoré, Paris, is to be enriched with fine marbles and antique busts, which his Excellency bought lately at Geneva. They were sold by the heirs of M. Duval, of that city, where they were regarded as a point of attraction to visitors. The art-gossip of Paris includes criticisms on the frescoes upon which M. Eugene Delacroix has long been engaged, in a chapel of St. Sulpice. M. Debay, too, has been eight years modelling the monument to Monseigneur Affre, Archbishop of Paris, who was killed during the Revolution of 1848. The work, it is said, is far from finished—even in clay—so that our grandchildren only can reasonably hope to see the polished marble.

We note among the news from Venice that Professor Zantedeschi has given to the world a new instrument for taking observations of the sun, which he calls a spectrometer.

The gossip from Nice includes an instance of Russian enthusiasm for the Imperial family. The Empress Dowager went one day to see Villefranche, and to inspect the Russian frigate stationed there. Her Majesty crossed the gulf in a boat to Saint Jean, but about midway a breeze sprang up, the waves made the little vessel dance, and even threw their foam over the Maids of Honour. Her Majesty was protected from the salt water, but, nevertheless, on her arrival determined to return by land. Her sedan-chair was ready to receive her, and so were the Cossacks who usually carry it. But, just as her Majesty was about to set forth on her return, the Russian officers present insisted on having the honour of carrying their Imperial mistress—an ardour to which her Majesty assented, not, probably, without an idea that the sturdy Cossacks would be the safer animals. However, eight Russian officers bore their precious burden in triumph back to Villefranche.

The official journal of the Two Sicilies lately published two decrees, by virtue of which the moral and religious direction of the prisons of Lecce, Bari, and Lucera, as well as that of the Procida hulks, is handed over to the Jesuits! These prisons will be curious places for the penologist to study about this time next year.

While the Art-Treasure Exhibition is approaching completion, the directors of the Crystal Palace are making efforts in Paris, through Mr. Henry Mogford, to tempt French artists to Sydenham. Visitors to the picture-gallery now open in the Palace will at once see the necessity for this step. If a gallery of Continental art is to be arranged, let its directors aspire to get the best specimens of the best artists. Mr. Mogford must return with some Decamps, some Meissonniers, some Rousseaus, some Delacroix, and Delaroches, and Scheffers, and Steuens, and some scenes by Knaus. There are the Crimean pictures, too, by Yvon, Horace Vernet, and Gustave Doré; there are some Russian groups by Gerome; there are some fine shore pieces by Jeanron—all in Paris. We hear that Baron Taylor, the President of the French Artists' Benevolent Fund, is giving the weight of his influence to the scheme. Mr. Mogford should let the British public know something of "Cornelius," "Madrazo," &c. Why, too, should not a model of poor Clesinger's "François I.," now in the quadrangle of the Louvre, find its way to England? Mr. Mogford might also find the advantage of a visit to the Garde Meuble:—not to carry off the bronze statue of Louis XVI., modelled in Bourbon days to decorate the Place de la Concorde, but left now with grass growing to the Royal knees; not to put together the tumbled blocks of stone that are the wreck of the pedestal upon which the Duke of Orleans stood, in the Louvre quadrangle, under the July dynasty—but to examine the studios of French sculptors who have been working for the ornamentation of the Place du Carrousel.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

PRUSSIA AND SWITZERLAND A COMPROMISE.

The settlement of the Neufchâtel dispute has been attended with more delay and difficulty than at one time appeared probable. The Conference, which holds its meetings at Paris, has sat eight times. It has had before it the proposals of the Government of Prussia and the Government of Switzerland. The representatives of those Powers have taken part in the discussions that have ensued on the various points involved in the quarrel. After very mature consideration, the Conference has, it is understood, for in an affair conducted with closed doors absolute knowledge of what has been said and done cannot publicly be known—submitted a plan of settlement to the representatives of Prussia and Switzerland, and those diplomatists have referred the project to their respective Governments for rejection or approval. Thus the matter has reached a definite stage, but it remains to be seen whether the plan drawn up by the representatives of France, Austria, Russia, and England will be satisfactory to Switzerland and Prussia.

Prussia has reduced her terms so far as the money is concerned; she now accepts, and Dr. Kern engages for Switzerland to pay, 1,000,000 f. by way of indemnity; the King of Prussia retains the title of Prince of Neufchâtel, and Switzerland will give him a guarantee respecting the proper administration of charitable institutions in Neufchâtel. There are other conditions, but those are the most important; the representatives of the four Powers adopted them as the basis of an arrangement on the 1st of April, and the time has since been taken up with the difficulties incidental on putting the protocol or convention in form. It may readily be conceived that a solution which gives an indirect right to the King of Prussia to intervene in the internal affairs of the Canton under the pretext of seeing the guarantee properly executed, and the continuance of the title of Prince of Neufchâtel, will be very badly received in Switzerland. The Swiss will not believe that the King and the Royalist party do not still meditate the separation from the Federation of that Canton, and that they will carry it into execution on the first favourable opportunity. If the Federal Council, which is divided into two nearly equal parties, accepts the arrangement, it will be with the greatest repugnance. But what can Switzerland do alone against Europe? Dr. Kern, who left Paris on Tuesday last, will probably return about the end of the month to sign the convention.

THE DANUBIAN PRINCIPALITIES.

According to private letters from Bucharest, the Kaimakan and his official advisers are working with might and main in favour of the union. Agents have been sent into the different provincial districts to agitate in favour of those Boyards whose political programme is, "Union of the two Principalities, constitutional government, an hereditary foreign Prince, and abolition of the villanage and socage," and many employés who are suspected of being anti-unionists have been dismissed. The Kaimakan received positive orders from the Porte to remain strictly neutral, but he is a man of feeble character and does what he is bid by the Metropolitan, who receives his instructions from St. Petersburg. Baron de Talleyrand is at great pains to persuade the Wallachians with whom he is brought into contact that the union of the two provinces will be a panacea for all the evils under which they have laboured during the last half-century. It is generally believed abroad that there is no opposition to the "Kaimakanate" in Wallachia; but such is not the case. Several of the most respected and influential Boyards feel that their native country is in a most critical position, and one of them, M. Kretzouleski, has presented a memoir to the Commissioners of the European Powers which will hardly fail to produce a very deep impression on them. The gentleman in question, who was Minister for Ecclesiastical Affairs and Public Instruction, resigned as soon as the Commissioners reached Bucharest. "The sense of his memoir," says one of the Bucharest writers, "is that he took office at the request of the Kaimakan, but found it impossible to remain, as the Lieutenant of the Porte and Metropolitan squandered the revenues of the convents, and laughed him to scorn when he remonstrated. Many specific charges are made against the Kaimakan, and among the rest are the following:—

1. His Excellency sold to one of his relatives for a mere trifle timber belonging to the convent of ——— (the name is illegible, that was worth 17,000 ducats. 2. The teachers and students of one of the ecclesiastical establishments complained to the Minister of Public Instruction that they had neither sufficient food nor clothing enough to protect their bodies from the inclemency of the weather.

The Minister reported the case to the Kaimakan, and that high functionary put the matter into the hands of his friend the Metropolitan, who dismissed the teachers and severely punished the students. Almost everybody is of opinion that the peasants ought to be emancipated, and the following is the political programme of the Moderate Liberals:—

1. A Federal union of Moldavia and Wallachia. 2. A customs union. 3. The same organisation in the armies of the two provinces, and the right to unite them in case of urgent need. 4. The same civil and criminal codes.

AMERICA.

By the Royal mail steam-ship Europa, which arrived at Liverpool on Monday, we have news from New York to the 8th inst.

It is said that Governor R. J. Walker will resign for Kansas on the 11th of May. The plan for the pacification of that territory, which proposes to abolish the Draconian code of the Border Ruffian Legislature, is said to have the concurrence of the President and Cabinet, who "feel confident he will succeed in peacefully adjusting the difficulties that have hitherto distracted that territory." A few weeks will show whether Mr. Buchanan or the Pro-Slavery party is strongest.

A meeting of coloured people was held in Philadelphia "to consider the atrocious decision of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case, and other outrages to which the coloured people are subjected under the Constitution of the United States." Various speeches were made, and a series of resolutions adopted.

Upon the China question the Washington correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer says:—

The official journal a few days since had an article, breathing an air of authority, stating that it was not the policy of this Government to enter into any alliance with Great Britain in her present struggles against China, on the ground that we are at peace with that empire, and have no other interest connected with these troubles than the security and extension of commerce. This is undoubtedly a correct view. England may have ambitious designs in the war upon which she enters with so much alacrity and energy, which designs will naturally lead to acquisitions of territory. With such objects we can have no sympathy, because, however ardently we may desire the annexation of the possessions of other nations lying near our present territory, the acquirement of foreign colonies is entirely inconsistent with our system, as well as opposed to the traditions and maxims of the party which is now responsible for the administration. It may be added that it is the opinion of several naval gentlemen with whom I have conversed, that Commodore Perry will be offered the command of the fleet about to be collected for the special service of the Chinese difficulties.

Another Washington correspondent says:—

Our affairs with China continue to occupy the attention of the Administration. Since it has been known that the British Government has appointed Lord Elgin as Minister Plenipotentiary to China our Government has determined to send one thither; but, owing to the great distance of China and the time that will necessarily be involved in receiving and transmitting official communications, the Administration is solicitous in selecting a Minister in whom the utmost confidence can be placed, and who will be governed by a wise discretion, considering the general interests involved, including our increasing commerce in that part of the world.

NICARAGUA—GENERAL WALKER AGAIN VICTORIOUS.

In our last week's publication we gave the news brought by the Africa to the effect that nearly one-third of Walker's force had deserted, and that "the Filibuster chief was in a most desperate strait—hopeless beyond redemption." The journals of this country had accordingly taken for granted "the end of this ill-starred expedition," when the Arago arrived with the intelligence that Walker had gained a great victory—great, that is, in so small a struggle—having in an engagement defeated his opponents with great slaughter ("they themselves admit," says the account, "to have lost 327 killed and 300 wounded"). It is added that he is well supplied with arms, ammunition, and provisions, and that there were hopes of large reinforcements making their way to his assistance. It is well to add that the news of Walker's victory, to the extent reported by the organ which sympathises with him, has not yet been confirmed by the Republican journals. The amount of exaggeration in most of the Democratic newspapers is apt to mislead an English reader.

THE ART-TREASURES EXHIBITION AT MANCHESTER.

THE gigantic edifice designed for the display of the inestimable treasures of art at the approaching grand exposition is now so far advanced as to justify the most sanguine expectations that it will be in readiness for the inaugural ceremony on the 5th of next month. During the last few days a great number of additional workmen have been engaged, and as fast as the various portions of the interior have been completed the directors of the different departments, acting under the general superintendence of Mr. J. C. Deane, have been busily engaged in arranging the display of the numerous contributions which have already arrived, and which consist of paintings, statuary, antique furniture, ancient armour, old porcelain, and bijouterie of every description. This work has so far advanced as to give the beholder some slight notion of what the effect of the whole will be, and certainly to all appearance the Exhibition will prove of the most successful character.

In order to make the undertaking remunerative at the low prices of admission already fixed it is necessary that during the period the Exhibition will remain open no fewer than between 2,000,000 and 2,500,000 visits should be paid to it. Many, of course, will go more than once; but, after making a liberal reduction for season tickets and repeated visits, nearly if not quite 2,000,000 persons must enter the Exhibition to ensure its financial success. It is evident that Manchester alone, or even the whole of Lancashire, densely populated though it be, is not able to furnish so large an attendance, and hence the necessity which the Executive Committee feel of drawing a portion of their visitors from a distance With that view they have entered into communication with most of the railway companies in the kingdom, and various meetings, attended by delegates from those companies, have already been held at Euston-square to make arrangements for the running of special and excursion trains from all parts of the country to the Exhibition. It fortunately happens that the Palace is so situated with respect to railway communication that passengers from London on the one hand, or Carlisle on the other, can be carried straight into the building. There will be no difficulty, therefore, in organising special trains upon all the principal lines of railway in connection with the Exhibition, and the different companies are acute enough to see that it will be for their interest to encourage, by reduced fares and otherwise, as many persons as possible to travel towards Manchester during the ensuing summer and autumn. In order to provide for the accommodation of visitors the Executive Committee have opened at their rooms in Mosley-street an office for the registration of lodgings, where parties having apartments to let and strangers who may require lodgings will be supplied with the necessary information and guidance free of charge.

The hope was for a long time entertained that the Exhibition would be opened by her Majesty in person; but the recent happy event puts that entirely out of the question. Prince Albert, however, has kindly consented to be present on the occasion, which there is some talk of observing as a general holiday. His Royal Highness will be received at the principal entrance to the Exhibition by a guard of honour, and it is not improbable that a considerable military force, under the command of Sir Harry Smith, the General commanding in the Midland district, may add alike to the splendour and the dignity of the spectacle. The Prince will be conducted in the first instance to the reception-room near the entrance of the building, from which, after the lapse of a few minutes, he will emerge in a procession formed of the members of his suite, the Executive Committee, and the principal officials of the Exhibition, and will walk, thus accompanied, up the great hall to the dais in the centre of the Transept. There an address will be presented to his Royal Highness by Mr Fairbairn, the Chairman of the Committee, to which an appropriate answer will doubtless be returned. The Mayor of Manchester, in the name of the corporate authorities of the city, will next read and present an address, to which also a reply may be expected. The procession will then be re-formed, and the Prince will proceed to inspect the Galleries of Ancient and Modern Pictures, the Portrait Gallery, the Gallery of Water-Colours, the Collection of Engravings, and the Court of Oriental Productions—a promenade which will embrace nearly every portion of the building His Royal Highness will then return to the Transept, and formally declare the Exhibition opened, after which he will retire with the same ceremony as before. During these proceedings the orchestra, consisting of 500 performers, under the direction of M. Hallé, will execute a selection of appropriate music; and during the intervals the grand organ that in course of erection by Messrs. Jardine and Jardine, of Manchester, will send its swelling tones in waves of harmony through the building In the evening the Prince will be present at a concert to be given in the Free-trade Hall under the auspices of the Executive Committee.

THE INAUGURATION.

On Saturday last Mr. Thomas Fairbairn and Mr Heron had the honour of an interview with his Royal Highness Prince Albert, at Buckingham Palace, to submit for approval the final arrangements for the ceremonial to be observed on the opening of the Exhibition on Tuesday, the 5th of May. All the arrangements as usual on great occasions which are honoured with the presence of Royalty are to be observed; and invitations will be issued to her Majesty's Ministers, the Foreign Ambassadors, the heads of the various public bodies associated with art, and those who are officially connected with the surrounding districts.

As we are informed that the Queen has expressed his intention of appearing in full uniform, it will be necessary for all officially engaged in the ceremonial to attend in uniform or Court dress; and although visitors generally, who may be entitled by office to wear uniform will under the circumstances appear in full costume, we may anticipate that the spectacle will be one of unusual splendour.

PREPARATIONS PROGRESS.

Since our last notice the arrivals of packages have been unceasing, and during Monday forenoon we saw opened, and carried off to their respective galleries, some pictures, both ancient and modern, that in size and beauty will scarcely be excelled by any that will be found in the Exhibition

Mr. A. Egg has completed the hanging of Gallery F, containing the most recent works of modern artists. It is possible that at a few points it may be necessary to remove some of the pictures already hung, and to substitute others for them; but that will not affect the merit or the force of the observations we desire to make. The gallery has been cleared of all the stages, &c., used in the hanging, a piece of statuary has been placed in its centre upon trial; and there are a few specimens of the elegant, comfortable-looking, crimson-upholstered seats and settees which are to be placed for the comfort of visitors. And as so arranged, while yet wanting the finishing touches of the upholsterer, it was impossible on Monday to pass into Gallery F from the Transept without feeling that a better-proportioned, better-lighted, or more chastely-decorated gallery could scarcely be fitted; while the walls are literally radiant with a collection of the gems of modern art, such as assuredly never before was seen under one roof. The other Modern Galleries (E and D) are gradually being "hung," satisfactory progress being made. Mr. E. Bellhouse is fitting the iron rails in the galleries, to prevent visitors pressing upon or touching the pictures.

The decoration of the Oriental Court is now nearly completed; and the work there, like all of Mr. Crace's, is excellently done; while the general effect, as might be supposed from the object of the court, is richer than in any other part of the Palace. The tone of the walls is a sage green, with an unobtrusive pattern ground. The bold rich ornamental frieze is in various colours of Oriental character, with light inland ornaments in maroon, and from it there is dropped a series of slender and very tasteful pendent ornaments, which serve to carry down the colour of the frieze to the fabrics to be displayed upon the walls. The ceiling also is very characteristically painted in Oriental ornaments, forming a series of panels; the ground being of a cream colour, with grey margins introducing angle ornaments in gold.

The long Water-Colour Gallery is finished, and the decoration of the two smaller galleries is proceeding satisfactorily. The walls are in neutral grey, with the Greek fret ornament forming the frieze. Above the skirting the same ornament is repeated; and the cornices are painted in imitation of bronze, relieved with gold. The ceilings are in shades of cream colour, relieved with grey, and marginal lines in maroon. The constructive iron arches and tiles (the roof of the Great Gallery being semicircular) are painted in bronze and gold. The arches forming the terminations of the gallery, and also the intermediate arches, are in neutral shades of buff, relieved with ornaments in a quiet maroon, thus throwing their faces into a series of panels. The Water-Colour Galleries have a peculiarly pleasant and cheerful aspect.

VISIT OF RAILWAY OFFICIALS.

A number of representatives of the principal railway companies intending to meet in Manchester for the completion of their arrangements for special trains, &c., the Executive Committee issued invitations to those gentlemen to visit the Palace, with their wives, daughters, &c Accordingly more than 100 gentlemen and ladies arrived at the Palace on Wednesday afternoon, about two o'clock, and were conducted through the various departments. At three o'clock the guests sat down in the spacious second-class refreshment-room to an elegant cold collation, supplied by Mr. Donald, the caterer for the Palace and Botanic Gardens. Mr. T Fairbairn, chairman of the Executive Committee, presided; and all the other members were present, with the exception of the Mayor.

Mr. Thomas Fairbairn announced that it had been arranged that there should be nothing like formal toast-proposing but, with so many of the representatives of the railways present, he could not avoid expressing a hope that, from what they had already seen, they would be convinced that the Exhibition would well repay many and many a visit, and that, in fact, the collection of Art-Treasures would be such as had never before been seen together since the world began.

Captain Huish, secretary of the London and North-Western Railway Company, in the course of a brief speech, said he was not prepared to state exactly what would be done by the different railway companies in order to second, as far as they could, the noble efforts which had been made by the public spirit of this city; but he thought he could venture to say that, so strongly did they feel that the interests of this great undertaking were bound up with their own, no effort upon their part—no liberality that could be fairly asked from them—would be denied by the railway interest (Hear, hear). It would be their duty and privilege to bring to the Exhibition—which was such as the world had never yet produced, and which, in all human probability, could never again be equalled—it would be their duty, if they possibly could, to bring to it, in fact, the population of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Edward Watkin, M.P. (as representing the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company), said his visit to this Exhibition made him feel proud of the name of Englishman, and of that of a Manchester man; when he saw the way in which this building had grown to its present completion, under the zealous and superintendence of the Executive Committee (Hear). He had never visited the spot since the time when—on a very misty and particularly Manchester day—he and others came there to endeavour to fix on a fitting site for a railway station. Now, when he came again, he saw this magnificent creation crowded with some of the noblest works that ever proceeded from the pencil of artist, placed in a building worthy even of those works. It was acknowledged that "the greatest happiness to the greatest number" was a thing to be sought; and to bring the largest number of persons, at the largest amount in totality, although made up of very small units, should be recognised as the principle to be followed in the management of railways; and he hoped that it would not be forgotten or overlooked in connection with the great Art-Treasures Exhibition (Hear, hear).

The railway companies have determined to run special trains on the opening day, and, so soon as the shilling days commence, to start special excursion trains at low fares. The endeavour of each of the companies will be (while giving a facility to those who intend making a stay in Manchester) to so arrange their trains that visitors even from so great a distance as London may be taken hither, have several hours for the Exhibition, and reach home again in good time the same night. All the companies will run their principal trains up to the Exhibition station.

ERUPTION OF THE VOLCANO AT FUEGO, IN GUATEMALA.

WE have been favoured by Dr. Lindley with the following extract from a private letter describing this phenomenon, with a slight Sketch:

"GUATEMALA, March 3, 1857.

"On the 17th of February the Volcano de Fuego had a magnificent eruption (it was 9th January last year). Inclosed you have the observations made in the Observatory here by the Rev. Padre Canudas, Professor of Mathematics in the Jesuits' College. We are here 5000 English feet above the level of the sea. The Volcano de Fuego bears N.W. of this city, and as the Padre says, by observations and calculations, is twenty-three miles distant as the crow flies. You will see by the inclosed that the Padre measured the column of fire, which gave an angle of 49 deg., and taking the distance 43,518 metres, resulting 620 metres, or nearly 735 Spanish yards (34 English inches). At half-past seven o'clock in the evening of the 17th the volcano appeared as seen by myself from the roof of a house with an opera-glass, as follows:—At intervals of ten and fifteen minutes a shower of stones or cinders, and we could discern the red-hot stones bounding down the sides. The distance to the base of this volcano, by the direct road, is about forty miles; but, as the crow flies, the Padre's calculation must be nearly, if not quite, correct. The dark marks were streams of lava; and a dense cloud hung on to the north as if chained to the mountain; but the country to the north-west and north is covered with scoriæ. From the wind being N.N.E., none fell on this side this time. Such an eruption as this is not in the memory of the oldest inhabitant. Fire has been seen, but so small the column as scarcely distinguishable. In this instance the whole mountain was made perfectly clear, and the night was admirable—intensely dark. This volcano is 14,127 English feet above the level of the sea; and is now, as it presents a continued spiral plume of smoke, a splendid object, particularly as seen from the southern side, where it is a perfect cone; and there lies the great crater, with a river of lava. Mr. Woodhill was struck with a line we passed through of perfectly dead vegetation, produced by a river of sulphuric sand thrown out, and washed down for ten leagues along the coast.

"I ought to observe that the observatory of the College here is on the roof of the house—a wooden erection some sixty-five or seventy feet high. Our sun is always very powerful, and will raise the temperature in such a building far beyond its genuine influence.

"We have news from California, San Francisco, to 5th Feb. The snow seems to have destroyed many lives in the Nevada there; and even in the city of Mexico they have had a fall of snow. The volcanoes here were covered quite white on the 19th and 20th of Jan., but the snow did not remain above two hours after sunrise. Weadland and I crossed the N.E. step of the Volcano de Fuego on the morning of the 19th, and it was excessively cold. The thermometers used are centigrade."

EN ROUTE FOR CHINA.

SUEZ, March 22nd, 1857.

WE had a delightful journey up to Alexandria. At one p.m. we saw the distant minarets on a level with the sea, and great was the crowd on the paddlebox to have a view, though the sun was very hot at the time. Our pilot was already on board—he was a real Mussulman, with turban—and we were soon boarded by the Egyptians, most picturesque-looking fellows, full of fun. We went on shore with the doctor and some officers of her Majesty's ship Tartarus, who mounted some donkeys and galloped along the dusty streets, shouting out "guarda!" nearly upsetting some true believers. We went up towards the canal, through what the officers called "Hyde-park." The trees are palm and bananas, with an underwood of gigantic cactuses. On the wayside, seeing a native café, we squatted down à la Turc, and partook of coffee, served in two cups to prevent your fingers getting burnt. The stylish turnouts we saw would astonish you—such carriages, and always a servant running before to clear the way. Crinoline has turned the heads of the ladies even in Egypt (I mean, of course, the Europeans, as the native still adhere to their blue coverings), they dress grandly, as do also the gentlemen. We then went on board the Tartarus, and, having been there hospitably entertained, returned on board our Valetta, the best of ships, and slept till morning, notwithstanding the noise the natives made in coaling.

Next morning we went ashore to the station (of which I send you a sketch), a medley of English and natives; outside heaps of donkey-boys are recommending their donkeys in the best English. The scene at the station was very striking with the English, in their veils, linens, and fantastic head-dresses, and the natives in their picturesque costumes. We got into the train, a most comfortable carriage, with double top to keep out the sun, and had a delightful journey. I never saw such luxuriant vegetation, and such splendid soil. The crops were very high, and fields of clover, sugar-cane, cotton, &c., rendered the scene like a vast vegetable garden. Cows, buffaloes, camels, horses, and sheep thronged the country; whilst the natives were everywhere busy with husbandry. The banks of the canal are covered with villas surrounded by palm-trees. The captain of the Valetta told us that when the train first started, the natives would not believe their eyes. "the firebox" could go faster than their horse, but they found out their mistake after galloping for some time. Towards mid-day we crossed the Nile in boats; there was a crowd of Anatolian pilgrims going with the train, and to see their women "bundled" into the boat like lumps of rag, amidst yelling, shouting. was a strange scene. At length, they were all got in, and we crossed over in a steamer. We soon arrived on the opposite shore; and having waited an hour for the train, off we started again, came in sight of the Pyramids, and then into dense vegetation; trees by thousands—olives, figs, palms, peaches, oranges; and in the midst of this green, lay Cairo in the bright sunshine, a cloudless sky overhead, but not deep blue has been used. We got into an omnibus amidst the tremendous yelling of the Arabs, and drove up to Shepheard's hotel, which was so full that some inmates had to sleep on tables, and on the divan that always runs round an Egyptian room. Shepheard is about to enlarge his hotel, when it will be, perhaps, the largest in the world. I left Cairo at ten at night, and got on board the desert van, of which I send you a sketch. We had a regular fog in the morning at Cairo; but it was followed by a real Egyptian baking day —the most delicious sun and wind everything dry and dusty, but cold nights. Shepheard had a blazing coal fire, in an English grate, at night.

In this country liberty appears to have taken refuge. Here you may do what you like; you may sing after midnight; you can go through the most suspicious-looking, dark, and unlighted street without fear; no garotters—no robbers—everybody is contented and happy, and desirous of making others so. You can dress in the most outlandish costume, and no one will look at you, nor is any passport required. Everybody speaks English—everybody is polite. Mussulmans are by no means bigots. We went in Mr. Shepheard's carriage to see some dancing dervishes. We all sat on the stone divan; I in my semi-Egyptian costume, for it did not take me long to turn a native, with my brilliant Egyptian silk shawl over my shoulders, and red, blue, and yellow stripes, with long tassels, a red fez, and scarlet sash round my waist. Thus equipped, I mounted my donkey, followed by the jovial and prattling little Nubian driver, with his grinning face and ivory teeth. We found the dervishes sitting in a courtyard under an awning—we sat like tailors—on a stone divan covered with mats, and natives handed us coffee. Having smoked a chibouk, we went into the mosque; all the dervishes were seated in a circle, on rugs and skins, singing "Allah!" "Allah!" in a monotonous kind of chant, and moving their heads backwards and forwards. Then two dervish boys came in and spun round for thirty minutes. The others had all got up, and were throwing their bodies backwards and forwards in the most frantic manner, their long hair flying about. They made a noise from their stomachs like the panting of a steam-engine, whilst some old fellows were blowing away on pipes and beating tomtoms. Some of them were foaming at the mouth, and fell down from exhaustion, but got up again and went at it as fresh as larks. I left them to the enjoyment of their movements, and drove home again.

We left Cairo by torchlight in an elegant little omnibus, and crossed the Desert; some runners came with us out of town and left us after leaving, of course, demanded backsheesh. We were all night and the whole of next day, every twenty miles stopping at a station to refresh. The walls were decorated with pictures out of your noble Paper, and Gilbert and Thomas flourish all round the walls; here, in a thoroughly Oriental town, where not a hat was ever seen, some of the sellers have stuck up engravings out of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. These station-rooms are all the same—a square room white-washed, stone floor, and divan running round the room, a table in the middle, and there you have it. I send you a Sketch of the entrance of one. The desert is strewed with dead camels in every stage of decomposition; but the air is delicious. We had two mules and two horses, and changed at every station. There were always two Nubians, who had to jump down to encourage the animals, to mend the traces, &c.: the fellows run most splendidly; their costume is just the white Nubian cap and blue kind of blouse, with big sleeves, that they slash up behind; that is, they tie the ends of the sleeves in a knot behind just at the neck. We stuck fast in the sand, and the mules would not go on. This happened continually; the yelling, the pushing, the whipping, all to no good, sometimes for half an hour at a time. I have made a rough sketch of this exciting scene. It is very characteristic of Desert travelling, and will always happen even with the best-regulated mules. Such is life. However, we got on very well after this, and at the last station fed again; pale ale is excellent in the Desert. We arrived at Suez at a splendid hotel, with real Egyptian rooms, capital ventilation, a delicious balcony looking over the Red Sea, of which I send you a Sketch, showing the English head-dresses. Everybody has a turban round his wideawake and a veil over that; it is the most becoming head-dress. Last night we went to a native coffee-shop, with our Turkish lanterns; seated ourselves on the stone divans; ordered narghilles, and pulled away like real Turks. We all had fezzes; and, through the medium of the guide, conversed with the soldier who had come with our caravan. I never saw anything so picturesque in my life.

The whole of yesterday was spent in pelting the natives from our balcony with oranges. The balcony was just above the Red Sea, which was full of boats. All day long we heard, "A boat, Sir? Want a boat, Sir? A good boat!" "Like a swim, Sir?" by semi-clothed natives. "Here, gentlemen—I say, master, take a boat?" "Here, here, want change for a sovereign?" Such were the cries I heard all day from Achmet, from Selim, from Abdallah, from Ali, e tutti quanti. The dinners were awfully noisy nearly 300 people at dinner, and no bells. When you want the man you clap your hands; Englishmen out of England being the merriest dogs in existence—we may ancy 300 people clapping their hands at once! The poor darkies did not know where to run.

Shepheard's Hotel has been long known as the fashionable resort of the Egyptian tourist, as well as the great halting-place for the Indian passengers en route for our great Eastern possessions; perhaps, in no hotel in the world do you find such an assemblage of people of rank and fashion, from all countries, as are found daily sitting down to the table d'hôte, in the grand saloon of this establishment. This year there has been a greater number of travellers than usual—English Earls, German Barons, the leading men of the United States, Russian Counts, &c.; and there have been for several days Swedish, Brazilian, Austrian, American, Dutch, and Australian families, besides a great many English travellers, all sitting down together at the table. The hotel is beautifully situated in the Esbekieh Gardens, or Park, Cairo.

fortunate system inaugurated at the Revolution, which compels the subdivision of land into small parcels, renders good farming impossible, and has virtually prohibited the rearing and the grazing of cattle, and forced the people to eat horsefl esh instead of beef and mutton. The fact seems to be that Europe, under the present social and political as well as commercial systems which prevail, does not produce food enough for its people; and France, with its bigoted Protectionism, its comparatively small commerce, and its large population living miserably on small farms, is among the first to suffer from the scarcity; while England—the store-house of Europe and America—with an industrious and enterprising people, and complete Free-trade, has the choice of the world's wealth, and suffers far less from the general rise of prices than any other nation. The Emperor of the French has found it expedient to increase the pay of the lower grades of the military and of officials in the Government service; but this is but an aggravation of the evil. He cannot increase the wages of working men; and the increase of the salaries of officials and of military officers, small as it may be in each individual case, is large in the aggregate, and has to be defrayed out of the pockets of the taxpayers, and consequently out of those of the working population. The increase in the price of house accommodation at Paris may be accounted for by the demolitions caused to make room for the splendid improvements which the city owes to the magnificent ideas of the present Emperor; but such improvements, beautiful as they are, may be purchased at too high a rate. There is no Poor-law in France; and when the people suffer they have no resource but to blame the Government and to agitate and conspire against it. This is the danger which at present menaces public tranquillity in France, and which the domestic policy of the Emperor—though not with such an intention—has done very much to augment. The state of France is anything but wholesome. With a good system of land tenure, with an improved agriculture, and with Free-trade, France might assume a much higher economic and political position than she now holds in the world. Instead of being constantly on the verge of revolution, and only kept from violent outbreak by an armed force of half a million of men, and a continual conscription, she might largely increase her population as well as her wealth, and grow alike in virtue and in happiness. We must do the Emperor the justice to acknowledge that he estimates at their full value the blessings which Free-trade might confer upon his country; but the task of introducing its principles into the densely ignorant minds of French manufacturers and operatives seems at present to be too great for even him to attempt. But he has fettered the press, and one of the penalties which he must pay is the continued prevalence of error among his people. Until this error be removed, France, we fear, must lag behind in the race of improvement, and be a cause of disquiet both to herself and to her neighbours.

THE COURT.

Her Majesty's recovery, we rejoice to announce, is complete. The bulletin issued on Monday was to the following gratifying effect:—

Buckingham Palace, April 20, 1857, 9 a.m.

The Queen is convalescent. JAMES CLARK, M.D.
The infant Princess is well CHARLES LOCOCK, M.D.
ROBERT FERGUSON, M.D.

Her Majesty's recovery is so far advanced that no further bulletins will be issued.

The members of the Royal family, the diplomatic corps, and the aristocracy continued to make inquiries until after this announcement was made public, since which, no further cause for anxiety existing, the calls at the Palace have become less frequent.

The Princess Consort and the younger members of the Royal family have taken daily riding and walking exercise. The Prince has made frequent visits to Gloucester House, to inquire after the health of his illustrious relative, the Duchess of Gloucester, generally accompanied by some of the youthful members of the Royal family.

On Wednesday the Queen had sufficiently recovered to receive visits from the Duchess of Kent and Princess of Hohenlohe-Langenburg, from whom the latter took leave of her Majesty on their departure for the Continent.

The Marchioness of Ely has succeeded the Duchess of Wellington as the Lady in Waiting to her Majesty. The Hon. Mortimer Sackville West has relieved Colonel the Hon. A. N. Hood in his duties as the Groom in Waiting to the Queen.

THE DUCHESS OF GLOUCESTER.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester is lying in a very precarious state. Her Royal Highness had enjoyed her accustomed health up to Wednesday se'nnight, and on that day received a few friends to tea. On the following day she was seized with a spasmodic attack, which, judging from the bulletins issued, leaves no hope of her recovery. On Thursday the following appeared Gloucester House, April 2—9 a.m.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester has passed a quieter night. Her Royal Highness's general state remains much the same. FRANCIS HAWKINS, M.D
ROBERT FERGUSON, M.D.
J. H. HOLE.

The members of the Royal family have been in constant attendance on their venerable relative from the first moment of her indisposition.

THE HEREDITARY GRAND DUCHESS OF MECKLENBURG-STRELITZ.

The Hereditary Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, accompanied by her son, Prince Adolphus, arrived in London on Monday from the Continent. Her Royal Highness went direct to the residence of the Duchess of Cambridge in St. James's Palace, and dined with her brother, the Duke of Cambridge, in the evening. The Hereditary Grand Duchess afterwards left town for the residence of the Duchess of Cambridge at Kew.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge, the Hereditary Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg Strelitz, and the Princess Mary of Cambridge, visited the Duchess of Kent and the Princess of Hohenlohe-Langenburg on Tuesday, and took leave of the Princess Hohenlohe and the Princess Feodore. Their Serene Highnesses the Princess of Hohenlohe-Langenburg and the Princess Feodore, attended by Colonel Stephens, left Clarence House, St. James's, in the evening, and travelled by the South-Eastern Railway to Dover, en route to Germany.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, accompanied by the Earl of Cardigan and Lord Panmure, left town by the South-Eastern Railway on Monday for Shorncliffe Camp, on a visit of inspection. The Duke returned to town to dinner in the evening.

The Earl and Countess Granville arrived in town yesterday morning from Paris.

DEPARTURE OF LORD ELGIN.—His Excellency the Earl of Elgin took his departure for Paris on Tuesday afternoon, accompanied by the Countess. The gentlemen associated with the noble Earl in his mission to China left London on Tuesday and Wednesday, to meet his Lordship and then proceed via Marseilles to Alexandria. The Earl of Elgin intends to stay two or three days in Paris. The Countess will then take leave of him, and return to town in the early part of next week. The gentlemen attached to the mission are the Hon. F. Bruce, Mr. Oliphant, Mr. C. Cameron, and Mr. A. Elgin.

ARCHDEACON DENISON'S CASE.—THE JUDGMENT REVERSED.—On Thursday morning the Dean of Arches proceeded to deliver judgment on one of the most important points connected with the appeal of the Archdeacon of Taunton. It will be remembered that one of the grounds relied upon by Dr. R. Phillimore (for the Archdeacon) on Monday was that proceedings had not been taken against the Archdeacon within two years, according to the provisions of the Church Discipline Act, and that, therefore, the whole matter must fall to the ground. The subject was fully argued on Monday and Tuesday, and it was upon this point that the Dean of Arches gave his decision. The learned Judge, after reviewing all the facts of the case, said he must pronounce for the appeal, thus reversing the decision which dismissed the Archdeacon from his preferments in the Church. Dr. Phillimore applied for costs. The learned Judge said he must decline to make any order. Mr. Bathurst, on the part of Mr. Butcher, gave notice of an appeal to the Judicial Committee of Privy Council.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

HER Majesty's restoration to health is advancing with happy rapidity, and arrangements for the Queen completing her term of convalescence in the sea air are semi-officially announced. The new Princess is as fortunate as her Royal mother. There is, however, a shadow upon the Palace. Bulletins, increasing in significance, seem to indicate the approach of a peaceful termination to the prolonged life of the venerable Duchess of Gloucester, fourth daughter of King George III. The age which her Royal Highness has been permitted to attain scarcely leaves room for hope that her present condition is other than the gentle dissolution of octogenarian existence. It is a happy sign that the amiable lady, in the late hours of life, finds pleasure in the presence and prattle of the younger children of the Queen.

The new Parliament will immediately assemble for the purpose of taking the oaths and otherwise qualifying itself for the discharge of its great functions. These formalities will occupy some days, after which it is supposed that a brief adjournment will take place. Mr. Evelyn Denison has been officially adopted by the Administration as the candidate for the Speakership, and may therefore, regard being had to the numerical condition of parties, be considered as Lord Eversley's successor. Some of our contemporaries have confused a portion of Mr. Denison's antecedents with those of Mr. Beckett Denison, and have given the intended Speaker credit for having furnished the Parliamentary voice which is to be "lifted up" on the clock tower—the great bell. This was cast from the design of Mr. B. Denison, who recently delivered an interesting lecture on the subject at the Royal Institution. He is a Conservative, Mr. E. Denison being a Liberal.

The Postmaster-General's Annual Report is always received with interest, not only as a matter of curiosity, but as an index to the social progress of the country. A few of its leading points may be mentioned here, but the whole document will well repay perusal. 368 new post-offices have been added to the previous number, and we have, in all, 10,866. During the last year there were 478,000,000 letters posted in the United Kingdom—the proportion in England giving about 20 to each person, in Scotland 16, and in Ireland only seven. In London the proportion is about 40 to each person. The increase is 22,000,000 in last year, and sixfold upon the number in 1839, before the penny postage. The initial system, for promoting rapid delivery, is officially stated to be making great way with the public, as we announced some weeks since was the case. A third of the London district letters are already initialised—a number amounting to 55,000—and a great proportion of the letters from the country. In most of the districts buildings, or sites for buildings, for the offices have been obtained, and the new system will soon be in full play. Meantime every intelligent person should, by example and by advice, assist the Post-office in working out the scheme. The trouble of affixing the initials is so slight, and the benefit so palpable, that stolidity or petulance alone can omit the process. It is, let us add, a curious fact, that one letter in every 200 (2,400,000 in the year) is returned to the writer, the attempt to deliver it having failed. Carelessness in directing the epistle is doubtless the reason, in eight cases out of ten.

Mr. Linklater continues his hebdomadal process upon the officials of the British Bank, and the Hon. John Stapleton, the Deputy Governor, has been the latest victim. His examination presents on point to which we desire to call attention. Before the bubble burst, warning statements appeared in the Joint-Stock Journal, in which the nefarious system that was being pursued by the British Bank was painted in colours so vivid that it is somewhat remarkable that the exposure did not excite more attention. It did excite some, and Mr. Esdaile, the Governor, was written to on the part of frightened depositors and shareholders. The answer that was prepared, in order to allay the terrors of the applicants, is a thoroughly characteristic specimen of the way in which the "Mr. Merdles" affect to speak of the press when is not scattering incense before them. "Scurrilous attack," "from a discarded employé," "low-bred vituperation," "columns of a print which has barely reached its twentieth number"—this is the language and logic with which a righteous impeachment was met. No wonder that the statements in the print in question were read amid "sensation," especially those which predicted "bankruptcy, broken hearts, and helpless despair." But this was a scurrilous and low-bred attack, according to the officials of the British Bank. The public may take it as a general rule that, when an official of any kind affects to speak contemptuously of the press, the sooner that official is relieved from responsibility the safer will be the persons with whose interests he has to deal.

Neapolitan Government organs are making an endeavour to refute the accusations brought against the King and his advisers of using torture to extort confessions and to punish offenders. But a lame and late denial, unsupported, except by some weak sophistry, can do little against the cumulative testimony which has been so long gathering together, and against the deeply-rooted conviction in the hearts of the Neapolitans. There can be no doubt that torture is malignantly, as well as judicially, applied in the King's prisons. Meantime, and until the explosion takes place, it may be pleasant for English people to know that the passages in our Parliamentary debates in which the leaders of faction have assailed the Italian policy of Lord Palmerston are reprinted as "praises of the King of Naples," and are circulated by thousands, as his praises, "sung by Derby, John Russell, Disraeli, Gladstone, and M. Gibson." How can these personages be at a loss for a party cry with the names of their chief friends and protegés ready to their lips—"Yeh and Bomba"? We are very sorry to see Mr. Gladstone's name arrayed in such a cause, recollecting that, in days when he was uninfluenced by faction, he gave vent to the natural impulses of an Englishman, and exposed and denounced the Neapolitan atrocities in a way which stirred the pulses of free nations, and made his name odious to the despots of the Continent.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. MASTERMAN.—It having been determined, on the retirement of Mr. Masterman from the representation of the city of London, to present him with a testimonial expressive of the grateful feelings of his constituents for the services he had rendered to the commercial community during his Parliamentary life of nearly six-teen years, and for his courteous attention to individual grievances, irrespective of political considerations, a committee was formed to carry such object into effect, comprising bankers and merchants of various political opinions. Mr. Thomas Baring consented to act as chairman, and Mr. Russell Ellice as deputy chairman. The first meeting of the committee was held on Monday afternoon, at the London Tavern, when it was resolved that the subscriptions should not exceed five guineas each, with a view to secure a general expression of feeling, and that the form of testimonial should be determined hereafter, at a general meeting of the subscribers. The committee embraces the names of the following among other gentlemen:—Messrs. T. Baring, George Carr Glyn, M.P., J. D. Powles, Samuel Gurney, M.P., R. C. L. Bevan, Thomson Hankey, M.P., R. D. Hodgson, M.P., Frederick Huth, Lewis Loyd, R. W. Crawford, M.P., Sir James Duke, M.P., Sheffield Neave (Governor of the Bank of England), M. T. Wegnelin, R.N., Abel Smith, M. T. Smith, M.P., John Ingram Travers, H. W. Schneider, M.P., E. W. Roberts, Henry Sykes Thornton, J. P. Gassiott, and J. B. Heath. Mr. Samuel Brown, of Threadneedle-street, is appointed honorary treasurer.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

FUNERAL OF A FRENCH EXILE.—Last Sunday morning an immense assemblage attended the funeral of M. Rougée, a French exile, whose body was interred at the Tower Hamlets Cemetery. The funeral started from the residence of the deceased in Charlotte-street, Blackfriars-road. As soon as the coffin was placed in the hearse, and the widow and the immediate friends in the mourning coach, the foreign exiles, to the number of about 2000, formed in procession, and followed, carrying flags, bearing various Republican devices, encircled with crape fringed with silver. The procession proceeded up Union-street, through the Borough, over London-bridge, and along Fenchurch-street and the Mile-end-road, to the Tower Hamlets Cemetery. Large as the procession was at starting, it increased in magnitude as it proceeded, until by the time it arrived at the canal bridge in the Mile-end-road it could not have been less than 10,000. When the coffin was lowered into the grave, M. Fyat pronounced a funeral oration over the grave. M. Blandier, M. Louis Blanc, M. Dillart, and Mr. Nash also addressed the assemblage. At the conclusion of the orations cries of "Vive la République Democratique et Sociale" resounded through the multitude. The people, who had conducted themselves with decorum, then retired peaceably from the burial-ground.

SALE OF THE PROPERTY OF LEOPOLD REDPATH.—On Tuesday last, at the Auction Mart, the freehold, leasehold, and reversionary property of the notorious Leopold Redpath was offered for sale by Mr. Marsh. The freehold residence at Weybridge, Surrey, fitted up and decorated at a great expense, with pleasure and kitchen gardens, stabling, &c., and purchased by Redpath so recently as the spring of last year, sold for £2670. The leasehold residence, 49, Gloucester-place, Portman-square, held for an unexpired term of thirty years at a nominal ground rent of 6d. per annum, and let at a rental of £85 per annum, sold for £960. The reversion to a freehold house, Marsham-street, Westminster, on the death of a lady and gentleman, aged respectively seventy-five and eighty-one, of the yearly value of £42, sold for £350. A similar reversion to a house, Richmond-buildings, Soho, let at a rental of £54 per annum, sold for £560.

GREAT FIRE AT LAMBETH.—On Wednesday morning, between four and five o'clock, a fire of a most destructive character happened in the range of premises belonging to Mr. Stephen Green, Imperial Potteries, Lambeth. The building in which the fire broke out was the new factory, about 120 feet long, by 80 feet wide, in the centre of which were four immense kilns. Owing to a scanty supply of water, and the smallness of the mains in that locality, the fire spread with amazing rapidity, and it was several hours before the conflagration was subdued. The damage is estimated at £6000. Mr. Green was insured in the Unity Fire Office.

HEALTH OF LONDON DURING THE WEEK.—The total number of deaths registered in London in the week that ended on Saturday was 1840, showing a slight increase on the return of the previous week, which was 1836. In the ten years 1847-56 the average number of deaths in the weeks corresponding with last week was 1052. Last week the births of 1092 boys and 831 girls, in all 1833 children, were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1847-56 the average number was 1567.

THE MADRAS ARMY.—NATIVE INFANTRY.

THE force and efficiency of the Army in India is now a subject of passing interest, and has, doubtless, suggested the accompanying combination which we have been favoured by a Correspondent. The Group comprises the different uniforms worn in the various ranks of the Native Infantry of the Honourable East India Company's Madras Establishment. The sketch was taken by a native artist; and the likenesses, particularly those of the natives, are very characteristic. The dresses, appointments, &c., are most carefully and exactly executed. The men were selected at random from the grenadier company of the 21st Regiment, now on detached duty at Coimbatore. There are in the Madras Army fifty-two regiments of Native Infantry. To each corps stand posted twenty-six European officers, viz.:—one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, one major, seven captains, eleven lieutenants, and five ensigns, besides a surgeon or assistant-surgeon. Out of this number there are seldom a dozen doing regimental duty. Let us take the 21st, for instance, which has more than an average number. With it there are twelve officers, including the Commanding Officer, Adjutant, Quartermaster, two young officers recently joined at Adjutant's drill, and four officers, on outpost duty with their companies at Combatore, Trichoor, and Dindejul stations varying from thirty to one hundred and twenty miles from Paulghautcherry, the head-quarters of the regiment, with which are six and a half companies. The Court of Directors recently sent out orders to increase the Captains from six to seven in number, and Lieutenants from ten to eleven—thereby adding two officers to each regiment of Native Infantry. This was a move in the right direction, but still far from sufficient to meet the requirements of the service. There ought to be ten Captains; and, doubtless, will be some day. From the 21st Regiment there are only two officers absent in Europe—the one on furlough, the other on sick certificate. Besides these and those above enumerated, the remainder are all employed on Staff and Civil duties in various parts of India. No wonder the cry is for "More officers!" and that the late lamented General Sir Charles Napier, when Commander-in Chief in India, so strongly advocated that demand.

The Sketch the Madras Sirdars (officers) are on the right of the European officer (in the mid-distance) the Subadar in full dress, the Jemadar in undress. Our Artist has portrayed a Havildar and a Drummer in full dress, one Sepoy in heavy marching order, and another in fatigue dress. There are in each regiment ten lascars, who are available for every kind of work pertaining to the office of pioneer, or connected with the regimental stores. The lascar may be noticed seated to the left of the group: near him is the puckally, or water-carrier, one being allowed to each company, whose duty it is to supply water to the guards, hospital, and men of the company; he has to provide himself with a bullock to carry the water borne in puckals (leather bags), so prominent a feature in our Engraving. If a soldier leaves at his death any male children, they are at once entertained as pension boys upon half the pay of an effective sepoy, with a view to transfer to the ranks when they attain the requisite height and physical proportions, failing of which their support from the State ceases at the age of eighteen. One of these pension boys our Artist has delineated.

All the native ranks wear the extraordinary head-gear, or puggree, and the non commissioned and sepoys the sandals described by the Bengal Artillery something in the same line. The puggree is indeed in shape and useless in practice. It is made of cloth-work, covered over with several coats of black paint, and varnished; and it cannot by any possibility be made to fit the head, and is entirely at the mercy of the slightest breeze. It is so much cut on service it is useless and in the way, and is usually thrown aside. The sandals the Madras Army do well to retain; from infancy the sepoy is accustomed to the naked foot and sandal; he is a much more efficient man, and can undergo more fatigue with a sandal than a boot on his foot. Where the boot is worn, as in two regiments of the Madras Army, and throughout the Native Infantry of the sister Presidencies, when off duty it is immediately discarded, only to be resumed when discipline renders it imperative.

The European style of dress adopted in the three regular armies of India is not only exceedingly unpopular with all ranks, as unbecoming, uncomfortable, inefficient, and expensive; but experience has proved that its many bad traits to confine, shackle, squeeze, and oppress the limbs with belts, buttons, buckles, straps, tight coats and trousers; besides a heavy musket knapsack, and other etceteras.

The present inefficiency of the army as thus glanced at by a writer in the Madras Athenæum of February 3:

> One third of the Madras Army is now occupied in garrisoning Burmah. True, it may be argued that the condition of this Presidency is now so peaceful that we can dispense with a portion of our forces, no longer necessary to the suppression of internal tumult, or to overawe the turbulently inclined. But we put forward this striking fact only as an example of what has been taking place all over the empire. A few irregulars have been retained, but the finest military officers in the Presidency, perhaps the very highest as an authority on this point, has hesitated to express his alarm at the present disjointed, scattered state of our forces. Pursue the examination and we shall find that the same necessity which has thus dispersed our army has reduced our regiments to mere skeletons individually. We have drawn upon our military chests and commissions and Residencies, Magistracies, and Civil Establishments generally, of forests, photographic fiddle-faddle, picturings of caves of Ellora and Ajunta, road makings, public works, and what not, everything, in short, of anything but a military character, until our regiments cannot possibly be efficiently commanded; and those who remain at their posts, the "refuse" as they have been politely termed by a brother officer, have treble their appropriate duties to perform, and, of course, get through them ungaudily and with disgust. We have only to look down the pages of an Army List to realise vividly the working condition of our various regiments.

THE PERSIAN WAR.—THE CHARGE OF THE 3RD LIGHT CAVALRY, AT THE BATTLE OF KOOSHAB.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE CAVALRY CHARGE AT KOOSHAB.

UPON the preceding page we have engraved the scene of one of the most brilliant incidents in the Persian War—the charge of the 3rd Bombay Cavalry, which has called forth the admiration of a Bengal officer, who cites it in proof of what horsemen, well led, can do against infantry. After describing the formation of the Persian square as excellent, steady, and untouched by artillery, he proceeds (in a letter to a Calcutta paper) with a vivid description of the charge.

We quoted the details in our journal of last week, a few of which we repeat:—

When Forbes, who commanded the regiment, gave the order to charge, he and his Adjutant, young Moore, placed themselves in front of the 6th troop, which was the one directly opposite the nearest face of the square. The other Moore, Malcolmson, and Spens came the following behind, riding knee to knee, with spurs in their horses' flanks. In rear of them rushed the dark troopers of the 3rd. In spite of steel, fire, and bullets they tore down upon the nearest face of the devoted square. As they approached Forbes was shot through the thigh, and Spens' horse was wounded, but unheeding they swept onward. . . . The barrier once broken, and the entrance once made, in and through it poured the avenging troopers. On and over everything they rode, till, getting clear out, they re-formed on the other side, and swept back—a second wave of ruin. Out of 500 Persian soldiers formed in the 1st Regular Regiment of Fars, who composed that fatal square, only twenty escaped to tell the tale of destruction. Thus the 3rd Light Cavalry, to use their own phrase, gave our enemies a jeesab (answer) for the death of Malet Sahib Bahadur.

The range of temperature during the week was 36°5.

A violent hailstorm occurred at noon of the 16th, and several showers fell during the day. A little rain was falling on the evening of the 21st, and it was raining nearly continuously between 8h. a.m and 8h. p.m. of the 22nd. The zodiacal light was noticed on the evenings of the 18th and 19th. A slight hoar frost was noticed on the morning of the 18th.

With the exception of the evening and night of the 21st, and the days of the 16th and 22nd, the sky has been generally free from cloud. The weather was very fine from April 17th to 21st. The nightingale was first heard on April 16th.

Daily means are obtained from observations made at 6h. and 10h. a.m., and 2h., 6h., and 10h. p.m., on each day, except Sunday, when the last observation is omitted. The corrections for diurnal variation are taken from the tables of Mr. Glaisher. The "Elasticity" and "Relative Humidity" are calculated, from observations of the dry and wet bulb thermometers, by Dr. Apjohn's Formula and Dalton's Tables of the Tension of Vapour. The direction of the wind is given by a self recording Robinson's Anemometer, the amount stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

BRUHN'S AND D'ARREST'S COMETS.—The comet discovered by M. D'Arrest is now becoming much fainter, but is still favourably situated for observation, and can yet be seen with a small telescope. The Right Ascension on April 24th is 5h 50m 30s, and its North Polar Distance 67 deg. 16 min. On May 1st the Right Ascension will be 5h 59m, and its North Polar Distance 72 deg. 4 min. . . . and on May 10th its Right Ascension will be 6h 22m. and North Polar Distance 80 deg. On April 27th it will be situated one degree north of Chi Orionis; and on April 28th it will be near Chi3 Orionis. On May 3rd and 4th it will be in the neighbourhood of 69 and 72 Orionis. The comet discovered by M. Bruhn is arrived at its greatest brightness about the middle of April, and is becoming gradually fainter, but is still much brighter than when first discovered. On May 12th it will appear of the same degree of brightness as when first seen; and on June 1st it will only be of half that lustre. It is very well situated for observation, and is now visible throughout the night. Right Ascension on April 24th is 5h. 2m., and its North Polar Distance 38 deg. 35 min. On May 1st its Right Ascension will be 5h. 31m., North Polar Distance 30 deg. 14 min. On May 9th its Right Ascension will be 5h. 53m., and its North Polar Distance 26 deg. 57 min. On May 15th its Right Ascension will be 6h. 21m., and its North Polar Distance 27 deg. 46 min. On May 22nd its Right Ascension will be 10h. 42m., and its North Polar Distance 35 deg. 25 min. On June 1st its Right Ascension will be 11h. 56m., and its North Polar Distance 41 deg. 47 min. At midnight of April 28th it will be close to 24 Camelopardi, and on May 1st about a degree south of 40 Camelopardi. On May 16th it will be close to 57 Camelopardi, and on May 22nd it will be near 43 Ursæ Majoris.—R.

THE GRAND DUKE CONSTANTINE.—The Russian squadron entered the roadstead at Toulon on Monday afternoon. The Grand Duke Constantine landed at the arsenal, and was received by the Maritime Prefect, the Prefect of the Var, and Admiral Trehouart. He was saluted by twenty-one guns from each of the French vessels as he passed them, after which the whole squadron fired a general salute, and the Russian manned the yards and cheered. A great number of steamers filled with strangers followed the Russian and French squadrons on their arrival in the roadstead. The Prince, immediately on his landing, spontaneously offered to review the troops, which were drawn up in line to receive him. At nine o'clock on Tuesday morning the Grand Duke visited the Arsenal. The crowd assembled was immense. The warmest reception was given to General Todleben. A grand review of 50,000 men will take place in the Champ de Mars during the visit of the Grand Duke Constantine at Paris. The 6th of May, 1st Regiment of the day fixed on for the fine military spectacle. The Grand Duke Constantine is in the thirtieth year of his age, having been born on the 21st of September, 1827. He married, on the 11th of September, 1848, the daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Altenburg. The Grand Duke has three children—a son, Nicolas; and two daughters, Olga and Vera.

THE HOPE OF THE NAPOLEON DYNASTY.—The Imperial Prince, besides going most afternoons in a pony carriage, escorted by Guides, to the Bois de Boulogne, is now taken out at eight or nine every morning by the nurse to the terrace of the Tuileries gardens overlooking the Seine. Sometimes he may be seen in his Hibernian goat-carriage—he goosted by two little footmen, a nurse walking on each side, and a tall hackey behind. This morning I happened to be passing through the gardens when the Imperial infant was returning to the Palace from his promenade. On this occasion he was not in the carriage, but in the arms of one of his nurses—the other being in attendance, and the tall footman close at hand. The passers-by on the quay near the Pont Royal rushed to the parapet which separates the quay from the private garden, to see the hope of the Empire in the person of the nursery cortege approaching he advanced a few steps, graciously bowed to the nurses, and, with a playful expression on his countenance, kissed his babe, to the great delight of a considerable an assemblage was behind the scene at the distance of only a few yards. The child looks remarkably plump and well.—Letter from Paris.

The Hon. Neal Dow arrived in Liverpool on Monday morning, per the Europa, in order to make a tour of the United Kingdom, and make known the state of the Maine Liquor Law throughout the United States.

MUSIC.

THE two Italian Operas have not been inactive since our last report of their proceedings.

"LA FAVORITA," with which HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE opened on Tuesday, last week, for the débuts of Mdlle. Spezia, Signor Giuglini, and Signor Violetti, was repeated on the following Thursday and Saturday. On both these occasions, and especially the last, Giuglini's pre-eminent merits, both as a singer and an actor, were fully recognised; and there is now but one opinion among those competent to judge—that he is the most accomplished and finished tenor that has appeared on the London Opera boards since the days of Rubini. Mdlle. Spezia, too, has received the public verdict not entirely done to her at first. At the outset she was injured, not only by her own excessive timidity, but by the quantity of newspaper praise previous to her appearance—a thing which, in nine cases out of ten, does a stranger more harm than good. Extravagant expectations having thus been raised, some disappointment was the consequence; but, when this lady came to be judged on her own merits, she established herself firmly in the favour of the public, which was shown by the great warmth of her reception on her last appearance.

Mademoiselle Piccolomini, the pet of the public last year, has reappeared, and will, in all probability, be as great a pet as ever. There was an immense assemblage on Thursday evening to witness her performance of Maria in the "Figlia del Reggimento," and the audience were quite rapturous in their demonstrations of admiration and pleasure. Thunders of applause, acclamations, repeated calls before the curtain, showers of wreaths and bouquets—every element of a triumph was here. There is no change in her, we think, since last year, either for the better or worse. She has got a little stouter, and that is all. Her voice is just what it was, and we find no traces of artistic improvement in her method of singing; while, as an actress, she resembles the clever French women of the Opéra Comique and the other theatres of the Boulevards. In a word, she is a very delicious creature, but no great artist, nor do we see any prospect of her ever becoming one. We may be very well pleased, however, to have her as she is.

AT THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA Donizetti's "Maria di Rohan" was performed on Saturday and Monday last, with moderate success. Such success as it had was due to the powerful tragic acting of Ronconi, to whom, indeed, this opera—a work of small intrinsic merit—owes all the success it has ever enjoyed. But one swallow does not make a summer, neither does one character make a play. Ronconi in the powerful scene of the catastrophe is terrible—appalling. But then we arrive at this scene after a long course of dreary commonplace; and moreover, the pleasure derived from Ronconi's powers as a tragedian is lessened by his defects as a singer—by his utmost total loss of voice and his false intonation. Mdlle. Rosa Devries, a comely lady "fat, fair, and forty" is too comfortable-looking to be the guilty heroine of a black and gloomy tale, though she has a fine voice and much talent as a singer. Signor Neri Baraldi (who was scarcely heard last season) sang the tenor part, and acquitted himself well, though he had very little room for the display of his powers. Mdlle. Didiée had more applause than any one else. She has made great progress, and is one of the best contraltos we have ever had on our Opera stage.

THE Concerts of the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY began on Monday evening. The programme of the performance was as follows:—

|---|---|---|
| 1. Sinfonia, in E flat. No. 8 | ... ... | Haydn. |
| 2. Aria "Il mi tiarì cuori" (Crescendo). Signor Belletti | ... ... | Spohr. |
| 3. Concerto in D minor, pianoforte. Miss Arabella Goddard | ... ... | Mendelssohn. |
| 4. Aria, Madame Rudersdorff | ... ... | |
| 5. Overture (Last) ... | ... ... | |
| 6. Sinfonia, in D. No. 3 | ... ... | Weber. |
| 8. Concertino Violoncello, on Forms d'une scène chantante, Sig. Piatti | ... ... | Beethoven. |
| 9. Duetto, "Quel sospiro" (Lucrezia). Mme. Anderstedt and Sig. Belletti | ... ... | F. A. Kummer. |
| 10. Overture (Les Deux Journées) | ... ... | Paer. |
| Conductor, Professor Sterndale Bennett. | ... ... | Cherubini. |

It speaks for itself, for it is a collection of gems unmingled with a grain of baser matter. Haydn's Eighth Symphony is one of those old things which never grow old—which, be their date what it may, never lose their freshness. Beethoven's Symphony in D, more modern and on a grander scale, is the work of the mature powers of the magnificent orchestra. Miss Arabella Goddard (the pupil of Mdlle. Dulcken) supplied the place of M. Charles Hallé, disabled from appearing by a painful accident) gathered new laurels by her superb performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto. The famous she was greeted with plaudits, loud and long, from all parts of the room. Piatti, in his solo on the violoncello, delighted the audience by his beautiful tone and brilliant execution. The vocal pieces were admirably sung by Madame Rudersdorff and Signor Belletti. The room was very full. We learn that the subscription to these concerts is large, and that there is every reason to anticipate a successful season.

THE Matinées of the MUSICAL UNION have also begun. They are always held on the mornings after the Philharmonic Concerts. The concert of Tuesday last consisted of the following pieces.—Mozart's Quartet in C for stringed instruments; Molique's Quartet, Op. 52, for the piano, violin, and violoncello; Spohr's Double Quartet in D minor; and a solo on the contrabasso by signor Bottesini. The most interesting feature of this concert was the first appearance in public of Mdlle. Molique, who played the pianoforte parts of her father's trio, accompanied by him and Signor Piatti. She was perfectly successful, showing herself to be a highly-accomplished young pianist. She is a pupil of M. Hallé, and does honour to her distinguished instructor. Bottesini, who has arrived in London for the season, after an absence of several years, delighted the audience as much as ever by his marvellous and beautiful performance on his gigantic instrument. Willis's great room was crowded to the doors by the most fashionable company in London. Mr. Ella's management of the Musical Union well deserves its success, for no concerts are conducted with greater activity, judgment, and liberty to the artists engaged in them.

ONE of the most elegant and agreeable musical entertainments of the season is Mr. and Mrs. Henri Drayton's "Illustrated Proverbs." It consists of a little drama, in the style of the vaudeville of the Parisian stage, but containing only two characters, personated by this clever pair. The pieces, now running with great success, are called "Better Late than Never," and "Never Despair." The last, on the well-known subject of "Monsieur Jacques," is a pleasant mixture of the pathetic and the lively. They are admirably acted, and interspersed with songs and duets, very prettily sung.

A TESTIMONIAL has been presented to Mr. Henry Leslie, conductor of the orchestra of the Amateur Musical Society, by a large body of the members, as a mark of their esteem and appreciation of his eminent services to the society as conductor and Honorary Secretary. It is an elegant piece of plate designed and manufactured by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell. The figure is emblematical of music; at the base are the names of the most eminent composers and a list of the more important compositions of Mr. Leslie. It was presented to Mr. Leslie, at a full rehearsal of the Society, in the presence of the subscribers; the eminent Amateur-Oboist, Mr. Alfred Pollock, acting as spokesman on the occasion.

THE THEATRES, &c.

ADELPHI.—This theatre has been completely redecorated, and made much more commodious, by the addition of several stalls, and a rearrangement of the seats in the pit and boxes. The house presents a most cheerful appearance, and gives good promise of what we may expect from the proprietor in the long promised new theatre, whose erection has been delayed by certain obstacles subsequent upon the move construction of the last approved. Idle and Unlike, and Love Among Actors, are both worthy . . . . . is a vaudevillist, as well as a good comedian . . . . . and seems to possess powers which his present character does not give him the opportunity to develop. Mr. Wright and his coadjutors continue to make "The Little Stranger" welcome to their auditors. A new drama is announced for the reappearance of Mr. Webster, who has been filling a most successful engagement in Edinburgh, where he is as great a favourite as he is when at home at the Adelphi.

CITY OF LONDON.—A new drama of some merit has been produced at this theatre, entitled "The Spanish Girl; or the Spy of Naples." The spy is one Diego, employed by the Viceroy Don Vergara de Carofa, to involve in a charge of treason the Count and Countess de Montfort, the latter of whom has rejected his unholy addresses. Such are Vergara's crimes that the King himself desires his removal; but the Viceroy still maintains his power, until Diego, who betrays his employer, rouses the populace to a sense of their political wrongs. Diego, however, is not the principal character; but the Count de Montfort, performed by Mr. Charles Pitt, to whose energy the piece was indebted for its undoubted success.

COUNTRY NEWS.

ALARMING ILLNESS OF THE BISHOP OF EXETER.—The triennial visitation of the Bishop of Exeter was arranged to have commenced at the Cathedral, Exeter, on Monday morning. The Bishop, who had been unwell for some days previous at Bishopstowe, near Torquay proceeded by train from Torquay to Exeter on Monday morning. On reaching the palace, however, he was seized with spasms in the region of the heart, and two physicians (Dr. Shapter and Dr. Drake) were immediately in attendance, and administered powerful remedies. So soon as the Bishop had been somewhat relieved, he was conveyed back to his residence at Bishopstowe by a special train, and the business of the visitation, in the absence of his Lordship's charge, was merely of a formal nature, and was conducted by the Rev. Chancellor Martin, who officiated for Dean Lowe, who is also confined to his bed, and not expected to recover. The present Bishop is eighty years of age, and was promoted to the see of Exeter in 1830.

WHO IS MR. WATKIN, M.P.?—A "Metropolitan" writes to the editor of the Yarmouth Press Press as follows:—"I see by your valuable paper, which I sometimes get a glance at here, that at your late election one of the defeated candidates, Colonel Vereker, and his proposer, Mr. Cherry, said he had a right to ask 'Who Mr. Watkin is?' Now although the latter gentleman gave them a tolerably good answer, there is one fact which he had the magnanimity and generosity to withold, which, for the information of the 'respectable' and 'genteel' Conservative electors ought to be known, namely, that Mr Watkin is the gentleman who gave Colonel Vereker's brother (afterwards a militia Major) a situation of £300 a year at the Euston Railway Station in this city, to afford him an 'honourable independence' at a time when he much needed it."

EMIGRATION FROM THE NORTH OF SCOTLAND.—The spring fleet has just sailed for Canada from the north-east coast of Scotland, carrying out 1500 passengers. They are chiefly agricultural labourers, and for the most part young and newly-married people. Large sums of money continue to be received from settlers in Upper Canada, who had previously gone out, chiefly from Aberdeenshire, and there is every prospect that, before many years, few agricultural labourers will be left at home. Wages have risen: but, when we state that the highest rates do not exceed £20 a year, it will not be thought surprising.

THE "DURHAM ADVERTISER" DEFENCE FUND.—A subscription has been commenced for the purpose of defraying the costs of the defendants in the late action, Davison v. Duncan. A meeting of newspaper proprietors was recently held in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, at which resolutions were passed thanking the proprietors of the Durham Advertiser "for their manly and spirited defence," and inviting the press and the public to give a substantial expression of their grateful acknowledgment of services thereby rendered, not only to British journalists generally, but to the whole community. Several of the leading journals of the kingdom have already contributed to this object, and the honorary secretary and treasurer (Mr. G. Bradley, of the Newcastle Guardian) has received from the proprietors of the Times the sum of £25 towards the fund.

A REAL WIZARD IN THE NORTH.—It is reported that Prince Albert, being about to visit Manchester to open the Art-Treasures Exhibition, expressed a desire to see the Free-trade Hall, a place rendered famous by the harangues of the great Free-trade leaders. Manchester, it is true, no longer delights to honour such men; but the wishes of his Royal Highness, and especially under such circumstances, were regarded as paramount to every other consideration, and it was determined to hold a grand dress concert in the building on the evening of the 5th of May, at which the Prince might be present. But an unexpected obstacle presented itself. On inquiry, it was found that the building had been let for the entire month to the Great Wizard of the North at the sum of £800. Overtures were made to Mr. Smith to induce him to give up the hall for two nights: but he would not listen to them, though a handsome sum was tendered. The hall was wanted the night before the concert for a rehearsal, and two nights would be lost to any great loss of time to the Wizard, but he was for a time inflexible. Happily his scruples have at length been overcome, and the concert, which is for the benefit of the Infirmary, has been announced. The concession has been made, but Mr. Anderson appears to have caught the true commercial spirit, and for relinquishing the hall it is understood that the committee are to give him £500, instead of paying £40 to the owners of the hall, by whom he would be released from payment to that amount under the terms of his agreement. He was master of the position, and seems to have turned the advantage to the best possible account. The ordinary charge is £30 per night.

A GOVERNMENT DEFAULTER.—A writ of extent has been lodged with the High Sheriff of Oxfordshire against Mr. Alexander Smith, Collector of Inland Revenue at Oxford, who now lies in the Debtors' Prison at the county gaol. It is customary for persons filling offices of trust, such as that which Mr. Smith has held, to stand some £500 to £600 belonging to the Crown. Cash to about this amount he is found to be deficient, and the Monday last a jury sat to ascertain what property he possesses to make good the deficit. Mr. Smith has been thirty four years in the service of the Crown, and in a short time would have been entitled to a pension of £250 per year. His present salary is £450 per annum; but it is understood that Mr. Smith has insured his life for an amount larger than that he had appropriated.

THE SIGHTSEERS DISAPPOINTED.—Great consternation was created amongst the thousands of sightseers collected in Rome for the Easter week, by the very serious diminution of the bill of fare caused by the resolution of the Government not to illuminate the dome, façade, and colonnades of St. Peter's on Sunday evening, nor to exhibit the renowned girandola fireworks on Easter Monday, because, forsooth, her Imperial Majesty the Empress Dowager of all the Russias had been prevented by the state of the weather from embarking at Naples so soon enough to witness the above-mentioned festive demonstrations in the Eternal City. It certainly was a most unpardonable piece of neglect of the Roman authorities to give not the slightest warning to the public of the change in the programme, in consequence of which crowds of frantic foreigners rushed down to the Piazza di San Pietro at the appointed hour—many of them paying eight or ten scudi (£2) for their carriages—and, after much disappointment and vexation of the commencement of the matchless spectacle, until betterinformed persons relieved them from further suspense, and sent them back grumbling and dispirited to their hotels. . . . On Monday morning a notification appeared, signed by the Senator Orsini, stating that the girandola was put off sine die, on account of the state of the weather, which, however, was by no means so threatening as to warrant such a disappointment to the public, the real motive being the non-arrival of the Empress; although other rumours hint of mysterious alarms of the Government, fears of a disturbance, and similar improbabilities.—Letter from Rome.

ZOOLOGICAL SPECIMENS.—The Museum of Natural History of Paris has received from Captain Bouet, who commands the French squadron on the coast of Gabon, three very curious animals—a Madagascar monkey, with a reddish head a koolyopteras, or wild bear of Gabon; and a male chimpanzee, remarkable for the dark colour on its face. This last-named animal fills up the blank caused by the death of Jacques, whose skeleton is now being prepared for the Gallery of Zoology.

JEWS' AND GENERAL LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION.—On Tuesday evening the anniversary festival of the Jews' and General Literary and Scientific Institution, Sussex-hall, Leadenhall-street, was celebrated at the Bridge House Hotel, London-bridge. A very elegant and al undant dinner was provided, which was prepared according to the rules of the Jewish law, by Mr. Myers, of King-street, Aldgate, and admirably served under the superintendence of Mr. Burrell, the proprietor of the tavern. Nathaniel Montefiore, Esq., the president of the Institution, occupied the chair, and was supported by about 100 gentlemen, chiefly of the Jewish persuasion. In the course of the evening the objects of the institution were very forcibly stated by the chairman. The toast of "The Relief of the Disabilities of the Jews" was proposed by Mr. Serjeant Parry, and responded to by Mr. Alderman Salomons. It was received with the greatest enthusiasm. The House of Commons, the Corporation of London, and the different officers of the Institution were duly proposed, and a substantial part of the proceedings was a subscription towards the funds of the Institution of nearly £600.

THE SECRETS OF A GAMING CLUB.—Some particulars regarding the working of a club called the Prince of Wales Club were elicited in the Exchequer Court on Monday, in the case Ransom v. Bosworth. It was an action brought to recover the sum of £50. The defendant pleaded that he was never indebted, and that the money was lent for gaming purposes. In his examination the plaintiff said he went to the Prince of Wales Club to play games of hazard. He knew that a "counter" was a fictitious payer, he did not know that it meant a cheat; he might think it meant that, but he could not say so positively. He should not like to play with one. He had between £200 and £300 in his pocket when he lent the money. He betted on horse-races. He had no other means of living. He had been a gambler for twenty years. The defendant did not appear in the witness-box, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the £50.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

FRANCES COUNTESS WALDEGRAVE, on the Friday in last week, re-opened Strawberry Hill to a select circle of her Ladyship's friends. The gallery in that romance in lath and plaster was, we believe for the first time, turned into a ball-room. Archæologists who recollect Strawberry Hill in the days of Horace Walpole, of whom there are few now living, can call to mind a sunny period, when Strawberry Hill was richly crowded with the rare collections brought together by Horace Walpole himself, during half a century of close attention to auction-rooms, and old china closets, and all the Wardour-streets of that day. Our archæological friends must have at once remarked the difference between the gallery as they remember it and the gallery as then presented to them; and yet there was, perhaps, after all, little difference. It is true that some of the old portraits were missing. We missed, as others missed, the Roman Eagle and the famous Bust of Vespasian; but the fireplaces and fretted recesses were there, fresh grit it is true, and looking very modern, and yet, notwithstanding, old as if Walpole himself had invited his favourite Duchess and Lady Mary Coke, with Selwyn and Lord Edgcumbe, to partake of his Christmas festivities. Others—but they were very few in number—remembered that Strawberry Hill was stripped and sold by the unsparing hammer of George Robins; yet all admitted that her Ladyship's purse, and, above all, her Ladyship's good taste, have been the means of bringing together many of the choicer treasures of the place. Thus at one end of the gallery is hung a charming picture, by Sir Joshua Reynolds, of the three Ladies Waldegrave, that picture for which Walpole complained that Sir Joshua had charged him an exorbitant price, some say 800 guineas; Walpole himself mentions a thousand guineas; while others thought that the Marquis of Hertford or Mr. Holford would be glad to give to-morrow, at Christie's, at least 2000 guineas for a picture so exquisite. We will not enter into the calculation of the interest of the money between Walpole's first outlay and the actual value of the picture at the present moment; but it cannot be questioned that every day will add to the value of any great picture by Sir Joshua, of which the colours, as in this striking instance, are unquestionably unfading. The other parts of Strawberry Hill were restored in the same good taste, adapting what was valuable in the old to the taste and necessities of the present day. We are to remember that Strawberry Hill was a bachelor's villa, suited to the wants of a man who lived much in society, dedicating his time to visits in his own neighbourhood, Twickenham, to White's Clubhouse, his Duchess's loo-tables, and the ball-rooms of Bedford House and fashionable London. Nor let us forget that in no instance did more than three visitors sleep in the house at one time, that the house is no longer a bachelor's residence, but still, most unmistakably, thanks to Frances Lady Waldegrave, Strawberry Hill.

In other parts of this restored (and therefore still in lath and plaster) interesting house we observed pictures and curiosities of great consequence to the connoisseur and the collector brought from the Waldegrave seat at Navestock, in Essex, and from the family seat in Somersetshire. Are we not right in saying that this restoration of her Ladyship's will preserve Strawberry Hill for a century at least? But we do not like to be prophetic.

The month of May will be remarkable both in English literature and English art. May opens to us for the first time the most magnificent reading-room which any country has yet supplied to suit the demands of its reading population. We refer to Mr. Panizzi's reading-room at the British Museum. The same month of May will see opened the magnificent Gallery of the Art-Treasures of the United Kingdom at Manchester, where will be found assembled, at the cost of something like ninety thousand pounds, a collection of works of art that the wide-spread liberality of the possessors of fine works of art in the three kingdoms has enabled a most liberal committee to bring together. It is remarkable that neither this great permanent reading-room, nor this temporary exhibition of the fine arts, could have been made, or even attempted, unless for that recent wise act of the Legislature that took the duty off glass. With stones and bricks and wood we could have done nothing of the kind in England. Stones and bricks would have been too expensive, wood would have been too dangerous; glass and iron being the only materials suitable, and at the same time sufficiently cheap, to justify the erection of such structures.

Our readers will remember, some two years back, the long controversy that took place in the columns of our contemporary, the Athenæum, respecting the importance of a portrait of Butler, the author of "Hudibras," sold by Mr. Farrer to the late Sir Robert Peel, and now at Drayton Manor. There could be no doubt that the picture which Mr. Farrer sold to Peel was genuine; but wise doubts were raised at the time whether the Farrer and Peel picture of the great author of "Hudibras" was the picture. Some of our contemporary's correspondents urged, with great appearance of justice, that the portrait of the poet in the Bodleian Gallery, at Oxford, was the original picture, and that the copy bought by Sir Robert Peel was a duplicate, though a good one. It is remarkable that in this correspondence no writer referred to a particular inscription to be seen on the portrait of the poet in the Bodleian Gallery. Both pictures were attributed—and we believe not improperly to Soest; but no one observed, nor has the fact, to our knowledge, been pointed out hitherto, that on the portrait in the Bodleian this inscription is visible in the handwriting of Sir Godfrey Kneller: "Samuel Butler, author of 'Hudibras.' Presented to the University of Oxford by Sir Godfrey Kneller." When we remember the bad light in which this picture is hung at the Bodleian, we, perhaps, have less ground for wonder than many would suppose; nor was it till the other day, when the picture was well seen for the first time since Kneller presented it to the Bodleian, a friend informs us, that on the walls of the Art-Treasures Exhibition at Manchester this inscription was plainly visible. There the inscription is: we state a fact which must be of great interest to all the admirers of the author of "Hudibras." Having said thus much, we leave any further controversy on the subject to Mr. Farrer and the correspondents of the Athenæum, observing only that Kneller was thirty-two years of age at the death of Butler in 1680, and that this picture, after all, might be an early work of Sir Godfrey himself.

This subject naturally suggests to us, what others talk about, that there are portraits of consequence of which we hear the authorities at Manchester could learn no tidings—portraits which they are particularly desirous of adding to their collection. Thus we hear that the present possessor of the best portrait of Dr. Johnson, by Sir Joshua Reynolds, is unknown. We allude to the picture painted for Bennet Langton, of which Mrs. Thrale's picture, now in the possession of Sir Robert Peel, is a duplicate. Thus we hear also that the authorities are at a loss to discover who is now the owner of the portrait of Cowper the poet, by Abbot; and that they are equally at a loss to find the owner of the portrait of the great Lord Nelson, by the same artist. With every wish on our part to aid the Executive Committee of the Art-Treasures Exhibition in their praiseworthy effort to bring together a portrait-gallery of British celebrities, we give this publicity to their wants, and shall indeed be happy if any of our many readers can assist us in pointing out who are now the possessors of these three celebrated portraits.

Artists are asking in what way, and that way the cheapest, they can best be conveyed to Manchester to see the Art-Treasures Exhibition. This question—it is one of moment to the success of the Exhibition—was answered, all but in slight matters of detail, in Manchester on Wednesday last, when the greatest railway officials assembled in the Exhibition building, and, after an attentive examination of the place, partook of a good luncheon, in which Mr. Donald contrived to rival Mr. Staples of the Albion, and Mr. Bathe of the London Tavern, at cheaper, and therefore Manchester, prices. We are assured by town-talkers that express trains will run from London, Edinburgh, Birmingham, and the chief cities of the three kingdoms, at prices still lower than those enforced by the railway authorities at the Great Exhibition of 1851; and we believe what we hear.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PROCEEDINGS ON THE OPENING OF A NEW PARLIAMENT.

On the first day of the meeting of a new Parliament, for the dispatch of business, pursuant to a Royal proclamation, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in Great Britain delivers to the Clerk of the House a list of the names of the members returned to serve in such Parliament.

Members assemble in the House and await a message from the Lords Commissioners.

On receiving such message, delivered by the Usher of the Black Rod, the House goes up to the House of Peers.

Her Majesty's pleasure having been signified by the Lords Commissioners, that the members of the House shall proceed to the choice of some proper person to be their Speaker, and present such person on the following day for her Majesty's Royal approbation, the House returns.

The House forthwith proceeds to the election of a Speaker.

A member, addressing himself to the Clerk (who, standing up, points to him, and then sits down), proposes another member, then present, to the House for their Speaker, and moves that such member "do take the chair of this House as Speaker."

Such motion being seconded and supported, if no other member be proposed as Speaker, the member so proposed is called by the House to the chair, without any question being put.

The member, on being called to the chair, stands up in his place, and expresses his sense of the honour proposed to be conferred upon him, and submits himself to the House.

Being again unanimously called to the chair, he is taken out of his place by the members who proposed and seconded him, and by them conducted to the chair.

If more than one member be proposed as Speaker, a motion is made and seconded regarding each such member, "That he do take the chair of this House as Speaker;" and each member so proposed addresses himself to the House.

A question is then put by the Clerk that the member first proposed "do take the chair of this House as Speaker;" which is resolved in the affirmative or negative like other questions.

If the question be resolved in the affirmative, the member is conducted to the chair; but if in the negative a question is then put by the Clerk that the member next proposed "do take the chair of this House as Speaker," and if it be resolved in the affirmative the member is conducted to the chair.

Having been conducted to the chair, the member so elected, standing on the upper step, returns his humble acknowledgments to the House for the great honour they had been pleased to confer upon him, and thereupon sits down in the chair; and then the mace (which before lay under the table) is laid upon the table.

A member, having then congratulated Mr. Speaker elect, moves that the House do now adjourn, and the House accordingly adjourns till to-morrow.

On the following day, the House being met, and Mr. Speaker elect having taken the chair, a message from the Lords Commissioners is delivered by the Usher of the Black Rod, desiring the immediate attendance of the House in the House of Peers.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker elect, with the House, goes up to the House of Peers, where he is presented to the Lords Commissioners for her Majesty's Royal approbation; and one of the Lords Commissioners signifies her Majesty's approbation of Mr. Speaker elect.

Mr. Speaker then, in the name and on the behalf of the Commons of the United Kingdom, lays claim to their ancient and undoubted rights and privileges; and especially to freedom from arrest and molestation, for their persons, and servants; to freedom of speech in debate; and to free access to her Majesty whenever occasion may require it: and that the most favourable construction may be put on all their proceedings.

The House being returned, Mr. Speaker reports that the House had been in the House of Peers; where her Majesty was pleased, by her Commissioners, to approve of the choice the House had made of him to be their Speaker; and that he had in their name, and on their behalf, by humble petition to her Majesty, laid claim to all their ancient rights and privileges, which her Majesty had confirmed to them in as full and ample manner as they have been heretofore granted or allowed by her Majesty, or any of her Royal predecessors.

Mr. Speaker then repeats his most respectful acknowledgments to the House for the high honour they had done him; and puts the House in mind that the first thing to be done is to take and subscribe the oaths by law required.

And thereupon Mr. Speaker, first alone, standing upon the upper step of the chair, takes the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and takes and subscribes the oath of abjuration, and delivers to the Clerk of the House an account of his qualification; and makes and subscribes a declaration that he is duly qualified.

Then several members take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and take and subscribe the oath of abjuration, and deliver to the Clerk of the House an account of their qualification, and make and subscribe a declaration that they are duly qualified.

Members being Roman Catholics take and subscribe the oath provided by the 10th George IV., c. 7, in lieu of the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration.

The people called Quakers, Moravians, Separatists, and others, make and subscribe affirmations in lieu of oaths, according to law. (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 49, 82; 1 & 2 Vict., c. 105.)

No member can take the oaths after four o'clock p.m. (30 Chas. 2, stat. 2; 13 Will. 3, c. 6.)

If any member desire to take the oaths before four o'clock, a debate or other business is interrupted, and he is called to the table for that purpose.

A member returned after a general election is introduced to the table between two members, making their obeisances as they go up, that they may be the better known to the House. (Resolution, 23rd Feb., 1628.)

Members seated on petition are not to be introduced.

Every member returned after a general election, on coming to the table to be sworn, is to produce a certificate that his return has been certified by the Clerk of the Crown to the Clerk of this House.

When the office of Speaker becomes vacant during a Session of Parliament, the House, on being acquainted by a Minister of the Crown that her Majesty gives leave to the House to proceed forthwith to the choice of a new Speaker, proceeds to the election of a Speaker, according to the accustomed forms.

When the Speaker so elected is presented for the Royal approbation, he does not lay claim to the privileges of the House.

By resolution, 4th August, 1855, whenever the House shall be informed of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is to take the chair for that day only; and, in the event of Mr. Speaker's absence continuing for more than one day, is, if the House shall think fit, and shall so order it, to take the chair, in like manner, on any subsequent day during such absence.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

On being summoned by the Usher of the Black Rod to attend her Majesty on the Lords Commissioners, Mr. Speaker, with the House, goes up to the bar of the House of Peers, to hear the Royal Speech read.

Mr. Speaker and the House then retire from the bar of the House of Lords; and, returning to the House, pass through the same (the Serjeant placing the mace upon the table); and Mr. Speaker resumes the chair at a quarter before four o'clock.

Before her Majesty's Speech is reported, some bill is read a first time pro formâ.

Mr. Speaker reports that the House had this day attended her Majesty (or had been at the House of Peers at the desire of the Lords Commissioners) appointed under the Great Seal for holding this present Parliament), and that her Majesty was pleased to make a most gracious Speech from the throne to both Houses of Parliament (or the Lord Chancellor, being one of the said Commissioners, made a speech to both Houses of Parliament), of which Mr. Speaker says he had, for greater accuracy, obtained a copy, which he reads to the House.

The said Speech having been read, a motion for an Address to her Majesty is made and seconded.

The proposer and seconder of such motion attend in their places in uniform or full dress.

The resolution for presenting such Address having been agreed to by the House, with or without amendments, a Select Committee is appointed to draw up an Address to be presented to her Majesty upon the said resolution; and her Majesty's most gracious Speech is referred to the said Committee.

On the Address being reported by the said Committee, the House resolves to agree to the same, with or without amendment.

When her Majesty has been pleased to make a Speech from the throne the Address is ordered to be presented by the whole House, unless her Majesty shall then be in the country.

In case her Majesty shall be in the country, or in case the Speech shall have been made by the Lords Commissioners, the Address is ordered to be presented by such members of this House as are of her Majesty's Most Hon. Privy Council.

Her Majesty's most gracious Speech (or the Speech of the Lords Commissioners) is ordered to be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the House.

The House, at its next sitting, according to order, proceeds to take the said Speech into consideration; and so much of the same as was addressed to the members of the House of Commons is again read by Mr. Speaker; and, a motion being made that a supply be granted to her Majesty, a resolution is agreed to that the House will to-morrow, or on a future day, resolve itself into a Committee to consider that motion.

---

The following circular has been addressed to the members of the Liberal party of the House of Commons.—

94, Piccadilly, 20th April, 1857.

SIR,—I take the liberty of informing you that the House of Commons will meet on Thursday, the 30th of this month, and will proceed on that day to the choice of a Speaker; and that the Address in answer to the Queen's Speech will be moved on Thursday, the 7th of May. I hope it may be consistent with your convenience to attend on those days.

I have the honour to be your obedient servant, PALMERSTON.

MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.—Parliament will be called together for dispatch of business on the 30th inst.; and it is likely that the election of Speaker and the swearing in of members will be completed before the 7th May, on which day the Queen is expected to deliver the Speech. It is said that there will be no opposition to the election of Mr. Evelyn Denison as Speaker, and that Mr. Fitzroy will resume his post as Chairman of Committees.

THE FALKIRK ELECTION.—A protest having been lodged by Mr. Baird's agent against Mr. Merry's election on account of alleged bribery, the electors of Hamilton have got up a counter petition, praying for an investigation, on the ground that they were subjected to intimidation, &c., by the commissioner of the Duke of Hamilton, in favour of Mr Baird.

The New York Chamber of Commerce has appointed a committee of twelve shipowners to inquire into the alleged cruelties to seamen on board American merchant ships, and to adopt measures for the suppression of the abuse.

The Spanish Cortes are to open on the 1st of May. The present Government will be strongly supported by a large majority.

THE KILKENNY ELECTION.

IRELAND is more fertile in election exuberance than any other portion of her Majesty's dominions in which the franchise is exercised. Hence the "rows" have been frequent, the excitement great; but in few places was the national spirit more completely roused than on the nomination day (April 6) of the Kilkenny county election, when the Courthouse presented the scene which is engraved on the opening page, from a sketch by Mr. Fitzpatrick. What an angry sea of electors are here giving a rough reception to the address of Mr. Serjeant Shee, whose energy, however, appears fully equal to the storm! What varieties of humour are portrayed in the assembled faces—from the good-tempered violence of the majority of the crowd, to the fierceness of the elector on the left beneath Mr. Serjeant Shee; while immediately beneath him is a phase of milder fun! And how complacently and delighted the folks in the galleries look down upon the broil below!

The results were singular. The canvass was so discouraging to the supporters of Serjeant Shee that he, according to the Kilkenny Moderator, had made up his mind to retire but was afterwards persuaded to go on the poll. His only object in doing so was, says the Freeman's Journal, "to take a few votes from the popular candidates." That paper, in speaking of his defeat, says, had he been less headstrong and a little more conciliatory, it is plain, from the proceedings at the hustings, that mutual explanations might have resulted in his being re-elected without a contest; but he was as stiff as his offended supporters were stubborn; he avoided explanations till it was too late, and the result is he has lost his seat, and Ireland an able and creditable representative.

The gross poll for the two days gave an immense majority in favour of Ellis and Greene. The numbers were—Ellis, 2587; Greene, 1620; Mostyn, 1314; Shee, 1034.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

THE EARL OF LINCOLN, M.P. FOR NEWARK.

THE present Duke of Newcastle is decidedly a young-looking man, even when one sees him out of the House of Lords, where the distances and soft lights may be supposed to assist delusions with regard to the personal appearance of our hereditary legislators. He is, nevertheless—although only born in 1811—the father of five children, the eldest of whom is of a legal age to enter Parliament, with nearly a couple of years to spare. The Earl of Lincoln, the eldest son of his Grace, by Lady Susan Harriet Catharine Douglas, only daughter of the late Duke of Hamilton, was born on the 25th Jan., 1839, and consequently entered his majority in 1860. He was educated at Eton, and Oxford, having been a member of Christchurch, and graduated B.A. in 1853. He was returned at the general election for the borough of Newark a fact somewhat remarkable, as indicating in a degree a return of an influence which up to the time of the Reform Bill was exercised by his family almost without dispute over the constituency in question; but it is probably more the personal popularity and Liberal opinion of the present Duke than any territorial weight which has secured on the present occasion the unopposed return of Lord Lincoln. The noble Earl professes to be a Liberal-Conservative, and a general but independent supporter of the present Government; he is an attached member of the Established Church, but in favour of religious freedom, and wishes for some satisfactory substitute for Church-rates. He is not inclined to withdraw the grant to Maynooth.

SIR ALEXANDER RAMSAY, BART., M.P. FOR ROCHDALE.

THE borough of Rochdale will be represented in the coming Parliament by Sir Alexander Ramsay, Bart., of Balmain, in the county of Kincardine, Scotland. At the first blush an inquiry is obvious as to why a Scotch Baronet should represent a Lancashire borough. The answer is very simple. In the first place, Sir Alexander Ramsay married, in 1850, Ellen Matilda, eldest daughter of John Entwisle, Esq., of Foxholes, county of Lancaster, and we are enabled to state, from an authority which is generally received with respect, that at Rochdale the Parliamentary influence "is chiefly possessed by the great manufacturing firms, but the Entwisles, of Foxholes, have some influence, though not of a similar [illegible]." It was probably owing to the circumstance [illegible] under Ramsay of the 50th Regiment of Foot [illegible] at the general election of 1857. He was defeated on that occasion by Mr. Denton doubtless the representative of the "[illegible] interest," the interest of which was, just then, [illegible] surrounding character than that of the Entwisles [illegible]. Always at the late church rate [illegible] Ramsay [illegible] interest, and as a general supporter of Lord Derby, it is just possible that in some quarters it might have been remembered that he is a connection by marriage of a Cabinet Minister inasmuch as his father's second wife was a sister of Lord Panmure. Sir Alexander Ramsay is the third Baronet being the eldest son of Alexander, second Baronet, by [illegible] J. Russell, Esq., of Blackball, [illegible] 1 April 1825. The family is maternally descended [illegible] of Balmain and Tusque, Kincardineshire [illegible] Parliament by James III., [illegible] adherence to that sovereign, was outlawed and [illegible] He was, however, pardoned, though not restored to the Peerage. His grandson was created a Baronet of Nova Scotia in 1625, and the title passed through seven Baronets, when it became extinct. The Baronetcy, however, was revived in 1806, in the person of Alexander Burnet, second son of Sir Thomas Burnet, Bart, of Leys, by a sister of Sir Alexander Ramsay, sixth Baronet, who assumed the name and arms of Ramsay. The present Baronet was educated at Dresden.

MR. EDWARD WM. WATKIN, M.P. FOR GREAT YARMOUTH.

ONE of the newly-elected members for Great Yarmouth is Mr. Edward William Watkin, who, with Mr. Torrens M'Cullagh, so signally defeated the anti-Palmerston and Tory candidates at the recent very severe contest in the borough.

Mr. Watkin enters Parliament for the first time. He is emphatically one of the people, and in the recent contest has avowed that he owes his position and fortune to his own exertions, and desires to be regarded in his true character—that of a useful and working citizen of a country which owes both its freedom and its power to the hard work and sacrifices of its people of all ranks.

Mr. Watkin was born in the borough of Salford, in September, 1819, and spent his earlier years in Manchester, having been taken from school and put to business at a very early age. He was for some years in business with his father, who is still alive, and is a magistrate for the borough of Manchester, and also for the county of Lancaster; and connected himself with our railway system at an early period of its history, at first partially, then entirely. He devoted himself to the prosecution of the Trent Valley and other railways, and became connected with the London and North-Western Company's undertakings

Mr Watkin is a steam-ship proprietor, and is now a director of the Oxford and Worcester and some other railways; and is also general manager of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway He has retrieved this latter undertaking from almost bankruptcy, and has doubled the value of its shares. He is, of course, very [illegible] in consequence. Mr. Watkin is a [illegible] introduced man [illegible] to the financial [illegible] arrangement of those vast [illegible] others the system of publishing the working expenses, as well as the income of railways, and of balancing the outlay, at short periods. This system, though not popular with red-tapists, is being gradually introduced amongst the more important lines, and will tend to reduce expenses, to give the shareholders a more ready means of judging how far their affairs are well managed, and to serve the public by enabling both the creation of those complicated systems.

Mr Watkin is a decided Liberal, and in connection with the Free-trade and other movements has done his share of the Reform work of the country. It was the [illegible] Public Press at Manchester [illegible] and [illegible] with his colleague Mr. Malcolm [illegible] testimonial of the leaders of the town of Manchester. Mr Watkin was an early and active director of the Athenæum at Manchester, and has always been an earnest supporter of popular education. He is now president of the Gorton Institute, which he founded on behalf of the workmen of the Sheffield Company. On leaving town to return to Manchester in 1854, after a long absence, Mr Watkin received from his friends and associates in London a testimonial valued at 1000 guineas, which was presented to him at a public dinner at the London Tavern. He also received from his colleagues and friends on the London and North-Western Railway a handsome épergne and service, presented at a dinner at Birmingham. Both these testimonials have been engraved in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

Mr Watkin is very well and favourably known in the industrial world generally, and also amongst literary men and politicians, he is a man of whom it may be said that he has very many friends and no enemies, and we predict for him an important career. Mr. Watkin is the author of two or three works—one a book of travels in the United States—which have been favourably reviewed in this journal.

Mr. Watkin resides at Timperley, near Manchester.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

WINTERINGHAM AND KIRKE WHITE.

WINTERINGHAM, on the south bank of the river Humber, possesses many claims on the attention of the antiquary, the historian, and the poet.

Here at one period lived the Marmions, and many traces of their castled home can yet be found. In the church is a mail-clad effigy, which is called "Marmion's Tomb," though every other record connected with it has long been lost or obliterated. Near the foundation of the ancient castle is a road leading to Winterton, which, in the vernacular of the neighbourhood, is called "Yarle's Gate," an evident corruption of Earl's Gate.

At Winteringham the great Roman road or Hermen-street terminates; and the interest of the neighbourhood was some years ago increased by the presence of Henry Kirke White, who studied under the Rev. Lorenzo Grainger, of the old rectory, before he went to Cambridge.

The young poet's favourite walk was along the bank of the Humber to Whitton and Alkborough; and as records of such he engraved H. K. W., 1805, on a tree on the sands at Whitton, and on another at a little distance the following couplet:—

Don't you see the silvery wave?
Don't you hear the voice of God?

A little above Whitton is the confluence of the rivers Trent, Ouse, and Humber; and perhaps in no part of England can a more extensive view and beautiful scenery be found in combination.

WINTERINGHAM CHURCH AND RECTORY DURING THE TIME OF HENRY KIRKE WHITE.

From the hills of Whitton and Alkborough, which form a bold promontory, you have a view of the Minsters of York and Beverley, and numerous villages, mansions, and manufactories. On the left you have the Trent, "wandering at its own sweet will," and before you the Ouse threads its way into the west of Yorkshire, like a silver serpent, and becomes the more animated by being made the medium of the barge-borne products of the hives of industry.

At Alkborough there is a maze called "Julian's Bower," which is supposed to have been formed by the Romans and at Winterton, about two miles from the Humber, there are the finest specimens of tesselated pavements that have been discovered. One of these, about thirty feet in diameter, supposed to have been the General's tent, has a figure of "Orpheus playing the harp;" and in compartments surrounding the same are the various animals of the chase, and in the four angles are cups and wine-vessels.

In the centre of another pavement is a figure of Ceres, holding in her right hand some ears of corn; and in a third is a bounding stag—all indications of mirth and plenty. The Romans made this their winter-quarters—hence the name Winter-town, now Winterton.

That Henry Kirke White enjoyed the scenery of the neighbourhood the following extract from his letter to his friend Maddock fully testifies. August, 1806, he says:—

Winteringham is indeed now a delightful place. The opening vista from our churchyard over the Humber, to the hills of Yorkshire, assumes a thousand new aspects. I sometimes watch it at evening, when the sun is just gilding the summits of the hills, and the lowlands are beginning to take a browner hue. The showers partially falling in the distance, while all is serene above me; the swelling sail rapidly falling down the river; and, not least of all, the villages, woods, and villas, on the opposite bank, sometimes render the scene quite enchanting to me.'

Who can say how much such watchings imbued the poet's mind with "hues" of beauty? But now the lyre is still;

The spirit, which its slumbers broke,
Hath pass'd away; and that weak hand that woke
Its forest melodies hath lost its skill.

The Illustration shows the Rectory-house and Church at Winteringham as they were when Henry Kirke White studied there. The Rectory has been rebuilt and the Church very much altered since that period. A. A.

FASHIONS FOR MAY.

THE new Spring Fashions have determined beyond a doubt that green and lilac are to be the prevailing colours of the season for out-door costume. These two hues are introduced either separately, or in combination, in dresses, bonnets, ribbons; in short, in almost every article of costume. Several bonnets have been made of tulle bouillonné, with narrow bias folds of green or lilac silk. Between each bouillonné there is a double fold of silk, of graduated shades of colour. Green and lilac are the hues most effective for trimming bonnets of the style just mentioned. They should be ornamented at each side by a bouquet of flowers, or a feather of hues corresponding with those employed for the trimming. Bouton d'or and mallow colour are also very fashionable hues for trimming bonnets.

An extremely elegant bonnet has been made of terry velvet, of a very light shade of lilac, or, more properly, of peach-blossom. The front, which is rather open, is edged with a fall of white blonde turned back; and in the inside of the front there is a narrow row of black blonde, falling downward. On each side of the crown there is a small bouquet of white marabouts, tipped with lilac. The inside trimming consists of a ruche of white blonde, with bouquets of shaded violets and strips of marabout.

Another much-admired bonnet is of white silk, edged round the front with shaded folds of green crape. At the lower part of the crown there is a broader fold of shaded green crape, edged at each side by a ruche of white tulle. At one side of the bonnet there is a cacoar head, terminated by a plume of white feathers tipped with variegated hues. The under trimming consists of bouquets of hawthorn, and a very full ruche of white tulle. The strings are of broad white sarcenet ribbon, edged with green.

Velvet cloaks of small size are at present very generally worn, and they form an appropriate intermediary wrap between the warm winter cloak and the summer mantelet. Large cashmere shawls are, as usual, much in favour at the present season. Many novel and elegant designs in cashmere shawls have lately appeared. The small velvet cloaks are mostly of the circular form. Some are edged with one or two rows of black lace, and others with very broad silk fringe.

The principal change in the make of dresses is perceptible in the sleeves. The pagodas, which have been for some time past superseded by other forms, are now beginning to recover fashionable favour. Pagodas, puffs, and the Greek style, may now be said to be all equally fashionable.

It has been mentioned that basques are not likely to be so generally worn as they have heretofore been. But this is a mistake. Scarcely any dresses, except those intended exclusively for ball or evening costume, are made without basques. They are of various shapes, and they present great diversity in the materials employed for trimming. Some are long, others short; some are cut out in scallops, and are castellated at the edge. Fringe is a very favourite trimming, so also is passementerie, of which a new kind has been introduced for the purpose, consisting of round tufts of silk. The effect of this new trimming is at once novel and pretty. When lace is employed for trimming a basque it may either be set on nearly plain or very full. Narrow frills or ruches of silk form an appropriate trimming for the basque, when it corresponds with the style of trimming on the skirt of the dress.

The most fashionable riding-habits are of black or dark blue cloth. The newest style of corsage for riding-habits is without a basque, and the sleeves are made very wide at the ends. The collar and turned-up cuffs should be of fine lawn or cambric, finished with broad hems and a double row of hem-stitch. The hat should be of black felt, slightly turned up at each side, with a black plume waving towards the back of the head. A small cravache with an amber handle completes the costume.

Three of the objects represented in our Illustrations of Fashion—viz., the cloak (with patent spring hood), the fan parasol, and the bonnet—are engraved from drawings made by permission of Messrs. Jay and Smith, from articles in the elegant show-rooms of their Sponsalia, 246, Regent-street. The cloak which is shown on the first figure, on the right hand side, is very elegant and becoming in form, but its peculiar recommendation is the perfect protection it affords to the head, without the risk of injuring, or even in the slightest degree disordering, the head-dress. Every lady must have experienced the discomfort to say nothing of the danger, attendant on the sudden transition from a warm to a cold atmosphere, on leaving the Opera, an evening party, or any crowded assembly. The old fashioned calèches, and the hoods of various kinds more recently introduced, have all been more or less liable to the objection of pressing upon, and consequently injuring, the flowers and other light ornaments composing the head dress. The objection in question is completely obviated in the hood introduced by Messrs. Jay and Smith. It expands by means of elastic wires, thereby affording complete protection to the head, without close contact, or pressure on the coiffure. The touch of an invisible and ingeniously-contrived spring instantaneously ruises the hood over the head when required; and with equal facility it is made to collapse, and to fall gracefully over the back of the cloak. The form of the cloak itself is shown in our Engraving. It partakes at once of the character of a cloak and a shawl. It may, of course, be made in any material, as fancy may dictate. That from which our Illustration is copied is made of white cashmere, and is trimmed with rich white silk fringe and tassels. The dress shown in the figure wearing the cloak is of pink silk, trimmed with bouillonés of white tulle and pink ribbon. The dress of the next figure is of green velvet: the skirt without any trimming. The corsage has a deep basque, with pockets running obliquely and ornamented with gold sequins. The corsage and sleeves are likewise ornamented with sequins. The bonnet is of pink crape, trimmed with white blonde, and with a long white feather tipped with pink. Collar and under-sleeves of lace.

The third figure wears a dress of mallow-colour silk. The corsage and sleeves trimmed with fringe of the same hue, but a shade deeper in tone. The bonnet, one of the newest from Paris, is of paille de ris, of the Marie Stuart shape, very much pointed in front. It is trimmed with a superb wreath of vine-leaves and roses, and the strings are of very broad shaded green ribbon. The fan parasol is one of those newly introduced by Messrs. Jay and Smith, by whom the invention is patented. It is constructed on an exceedingly ingenious principle, whereby it may be instantaneously converted from a parasol to a fan, and vice versâ. The convenience and utility of a parasol of this construction is too obvious to require comment. That from which our Illustration is copied is of pink silk, lined with white, and edged with white fringe. When converted into a fan, it presents precisely the form of one of those so much in use among the Chinese.

RUSSIAN MORTAR AT DOVER.

THIS trophy of the late war has lately been erected in the square in front of the Dover Sailors' Home. The mortar is unique in its construction; it was cast in 1803, is of 10-inch bore, and weighs nearly a ton. The Russian shells placed at each corner were taken at the same time. The mortar bears the following inscription upon a brass plate:—

This Russian mortar, taken at Hango, in 1855, was presented to the Dover Sailors' Home by Captain W. H. Hall, R.N., C.B., and the officers and crew of her Majesty's ship Blenheim.

The mortar stands upon a massive foundation of granite.

The crew of forty-five wrecked ships have found a refuge and have had all their wants liberally supplied in the Dover Sailors' Home. The directors are assisted in this great work by the Ship-wrecked Mariners' Society

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE last day of Newmarket witnessed the début of Kent, own brother to Sittingbourne, whose sheeted performances had created immense excitement among the touts for weeks before. Fazzoletto's faulty sinew also stood well over the T. M. M. in the Port Stakes, and great was his noble owner's delight at seeing his beautiful son of Orlando and Canezou once more coming home a winner. An own sister to Ellington just won the Zetland Stakes at York; and Skirmisher, who was selected to do battle, instead of Fandango, for the Aske stable, and with the weight in his favour, has flown, completely turned the Northampton tables on Lord Ribblesdale's horse, as his trainer always vowed he would do. This first of the Voltigeurs seems to have quite lost his ill temper; and the next day, at a mile and three-quarters, he made very short work indeed of Apathy and Wardersmarke, both of whom have run remarkably well this year, but the pace was wretchedly bad. These two performances, however, brought him to 14 to 1 for the Derby. Mary won the Flying Dutchman handicap under a very high weight, and seemed to drop from the clouds at last, Osborne coming in "hands and head."

The first Spring has four matches on the tapis at present, though it has anything but a strong bill of fare, except in its two leading events. Tasmania and Maestissima are in a 50-sov. stake on Monday; and on Tuesday all the interest centres on the Two Thousand, for which Lord of the Hills, Drumour, Kent, Lambourne, Alsion, Sydney, and Vedette will probably compose the field. Vedette, who is thought to be about half a stone better than Skirmisher, is now first favourite at 4 to 1; and it is difficult to see what will beat him. Lambourne was expected to see very much better than he did at Anton would be better suited if the race ended at the Rushes, instead of the horses having to come down and up a hill after that, which has stopped so many since this stake was established in 1809. On Thursday Blink Bonny, Tasmania, and Ayacanora are the principal entries in the Thousand, for which the great Melton mare must go, if she is to keep up her Derby supremacy. The £200 Two Year-Old Plate is a new feature on this day; and Happy Land (5lb ex.) is the only winner, as yet, among the lot. Kent seems likely to have the Newmarket Stakes to himself, unless Goldfinch has passed a better winter than his stable companion Schiedam. The betting on the Chester Cup is of the mildest description, and Ireland has all the steeplechasing to itself next week. Knockingen (Gormanstown), on Monday and Tuesday; Limerick Hunt, on Tuesday; Westmeath, on Tuesday and Wednesday; and Tuam, on Wednesday, are its tryste, while Rothbury, on Wednesday, is the only one of which the sportive Saxons can boast. Of stud news there is little to record; but Crucifix, who has had no foal since Chalice, in 1852, is, we believe, again barren this year. Prickwillow, the celebrated trotting sire, met his death very sadly lately. While he was being led down a hill near Raisthorpe he trod on a Yorkshire, which darted upward and inflicted a wound in his larrel. from which he died

The last great run of the season was one with Mr. Garth's hounds —sixteen miles without a check in something under an hour and a half; and, except during the New Forest, and one or two woodland districts, the foxhound is silent at last. Sales are the order of the day. Forty couples of foxhounds are in the market in one lot, as well as twelve couples and a half from the Duke of Cleveland's kennel. The thirty Cottesmore horses come up to Tattersall's on May 7th, and on Thursday next the horses which have carried the North Warwick shire and Mr. Talby's men will be sold at Bretherton's of Birmingham. Mr. Borron's celebrated kennel of greyhound winners will also change hands at the hammer, in London, next month.

The Boston Yacht Club have their opening trip on Monday, and the London Unity Rowing Club have four-oared races from Putney to Barnes the same afternoon.

A HASTENING order has been received at Sheerness for the fitment of the paddle-wheel Steam-frigate Terrible, now under repairs in No. 1 dry dock, Sheerness. She is destined to assist the Agamemnon in laying down the telegraphic wires between America and Newfoundland. The Terrible is 800-horse power; she has four cylinders of 74 inches diameter, with 6-feet stroke; and she previously worked up to 2000-horse power. It is in consequence of her being fitted with the most powerful engines in our Navy that she has been selected for this undertaking. A number of additional artisans have been set on to hasten her fitting.

SOMERSET-HOUSE.—THE CHIMNEYS.—The long-desired removal of the disfiguring chimney-pots of Somerset-house, has really commenced. Upwards of 120 of the most obnoxious shapes upon the river front have been removed by the contractor for the Barron Liebig, of Munich, for analysis. From the circumstance that such a distant authority in chemistry has been sought out, one so perfectly aloof from all local and political sympathies, one may fairly conclude that it is the friends of Alum who are desirous of corroborating the verdict of the English jury at the hands of the German analyst

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

THE demand for money this week has fallen off to some extent, and the rates of discount have ruled somewhat easier. This feature in the market has been productive of more business in the value of National Stocks, although the advance in the quotations has been trifling. On public account steady purchases of Stock have been made; nevertheless, the operations on the part of speculators for a rise have been unimportant—owing, we presume, to the Bank of France having raised the premium on gold from 8s. to 12s. per £100. This advance is calculated to draw gold from this country, and to produce greater stringency in the Money Market, especially as we are still importing large quantities of silver from the Continent to meet the Eastern demand. In the Stock Exchange money has been plentiful, and loans from day to day have been obtained at from 5 to 6 per cent. The fall in the quotations in Lombard-street, compared with last week, is ¼ per cent

The new Russian railway scheme has been introduced into the Stock Exchange. Messrs. Baring, the agents, state that they require £2,000 000 instead of £5,000,000, as originally proposed, and that the first payment will be £6 per share. The scheme is regarded with more than usual disfavour, and very few transactions have taken place, although the price has been nominally called ¼ to 1 premium. Some curious facts have been brought to light in reference to the means adopted to render this application to our moneyed classes successful; but this is not the only instance in which sham agents and buyers of scrip have been brought into the field; consequently, any lengthened notice of their doings is quite superfluous. No doubt the whole amount will be subscribed for, but it is clear that the shares will never be in high favour amongst the jobbers

The decision of the Bank of France in reference to doubling the capital of that institution has given rise to an uneasy feeling in Paris. The operators on the Bourse contend that the purchase of £3,650,000 of Rentes will be tantamount to a loan of £4,000,000 to the Government, who, at any time, may become large sellers of stock to the prejudice of prices. Should, however, the Bank be allowed to issue notes to the full extent of the loan —which we believe it will—the measure in question will derive considerable relief from the possibility of money becoming cheaper. In Paris money has been in demand, but in the departments the inquiry for it has been less active, owing to the dulness in the trade. Assuming the rate of interest is 6 per cent

Purchases of silver continue to be made on the Continent to meet the Eastern demand; and we learn that about £620 000 will be sent to India by the next packet. The imports of gold this week have been trifling, but those of silver have amounted to nearly £30,000 At New York the exchanges have taken a very favourable turn in favour of this country, steady arrivals from that quarter during the coming month The quantity of gold now on passage from Australia is valued at £658,000. Sales of bar silver have been effected at 5s 11d per oz.

There was very little business doing in the Consol Market on Monday. Prices, however, were firm. The Three per Cents Reduced marked 91¾ to 91¾ Three per Cent Consols, for Money, 91¾ to 91¾ Ditto, for Account, 91¾ to 91¾ New Three per Cents, 91¾ to 91¾ New Two and a Half per Cents, Bank Stock, 211 and 212. The dealings in most Foreign Securities have been very moderate throughout the week; nevertheless, prices have continued firm. "THE MEDICAL CIRCULAR"
ON DR DE JONGH'S
LIGHT BROWN COD LIVER OIL.
"Much of the pale oil sold in the market is found to be nothing more than Stale O.—a fact which will account for the failures which have so frequently attended the use of the so-called Cod Liver Oil. The utmost reliance may be placed upon the experimental researches of Dr. de Jongh, who is one of the most eminent of European chemists. The oil procured by him enjoys also the additional sanction of the opinion of Baron Liebig and the late Dr. Pereira in favour of its genuineness and efficacy. Our own experience practically confirms their judgment, and WE UNHESITATINGLY RECOMMEND DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT BROWN COD LIVER OIL AS ENTIRELY FREE FOR MEDICINAL PURPOSES, AND WELL DESERVING THE CONFIDENCE OF THE PROFESSION."

DR. DE JONGH'S COD LIVER OIL has now, in consequence of its marked superiority over every other variety, secured the entire confidence and almost universal preference of the most eminent Medical Practitioners as the most speedy and effectual remedy for CONSUMPTION, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, DEBILITY, RHEUMATISM, SCIATICA, DIABETES, DISEASES OF THE SKIN, SCROFULA, RICKETS, INFANTILE WASTING, GENERAL DEBILITY, AND ALL THE VARIOUS AFFECTIONS

Stay! stay! vision of youth and grace!
Stay! stay! radiant and happy face!
Stay! stay! light of our dwelling-place!
Sad in thine absence we'll be.
Thy smile was like sunshine, it glitter'd so cheerly;

Stay! stay! loving and kindly heart!
Stay! stay! joy is where'er thou art!
Stay! stay! wherefore so soon depart,
Leaving us here in our pain?
Yet if, like the Spring, to new lands thou art going,
To scatter thy smiles like sweet primroses growing,
We'll hope that, with beauty and grace overflowing,
Like Spring, thou wilt come back again.

NOTE ON THE MELODY BY SIR H. R. BISHOP.

"Oh dear what can the matter be?"—I have not been able to ascertain the precise date of this popular tune. It was printed about seventy years ago, arranged as a duet, from a copy of which the present version has been taken.

"A little chink may let in much light."—OLD PROVERB.

ANSWERS.

THE ESCALLOP ON HERALDRY.—Some time ago a correspondent asked the meaning of this bearing. The following remarks will, I hope throw some light on its origin and signification on which there is a difference of opinion among heraldic writers. The learned Guillim, on the authority of a "French MS. remaining in the office of Arms," states that the escallop signifies the first bearer to have been a commander, who by his virtue and valour had so gained the hearts and loves of his soldiers that they desired much to follow him over the danger's mouth, and that he in recompence thereof to their loves had ventured to make himself for their safeguard. Mr Bysshe in his Summary View of Heraldry," states that the escallop or cockle-shell was affixed to the hats and cloaks of the pilgrims in Spain, which had, since the invasion of the Saracens, become the theatre of a continual crusade, where the bravest of the European nobility ordinarily repaired to make their first essay in arms. Like the Pontifical usages of adding with a fish-man's ring. It was probably in allusion to the form and situation of the Apostles that such as went in pilgrimage to the shrine of Peter at Rome or to that of St James at Compostella, were distinguished by scallop-shells Mr. Coates, in his "Dictionary of Heraldry," says, this is the proper bearing for those who have made long voyages by sea, or who have had considerable naval commands, or gained victories over enemies. Mr. Moule, in his "Heraldry of Fish," remarks that the escallop is termed the shell of St. James as being the badge of a pilgrim. A stupid or the like expression was performed in the ninth century (to use the language of Gibbon), when from a peaceful fisherman of Lake Genasereth the Apostle Saint was transformed into a warlike knight who charged at the head of the Spanish chivalry in battles against the Moors. The gravest historians have celebrated his exploits; the miraculous shrine of Compostella displayed his power; and the sword of a military order, assisted by the terrors of the Inquisition, was affixed to remove every objection of profane criticism. "The city of Compostella, in Galicia, became the seat of the order of St. James, from the legend of the real body of the saint having been discovered there in the eighth century, and which became almost immediately an object of pilgrimage." Original Letters Illustrative of English Hist. Ellis. I find it stated by a writer before that the escallop was worn by pilgrims as a mark that they had crossed the water on their way to the Holy Land or some distant object of devotion. The general feeling among the escallop in the hat of a pilgrim, whatever the adventitious circumstances and signification may be; and thus the poet Southey treats of it:—

The poor with scrip, the rich with purse,
They took their chance no better for worse
From many a foreign land;
With a scallop-shell in the hat for badge,
And a pilgrim staff in hand.

And again:—

Something there is the which to Unfold would not be well,
Relating to the pilgrim's staff,
And to the scallop-shell.
And so also Raleigh:—

For the scallop shows, in a coat of arms,
That of the bearer's line
Some one in former days hath been
To Santiago's shrine.

Give me my scallop-shell of quiet,
My staff of faith to walk upon,
My scrip of joy immortal diet,
My bottle of salvation,
My gown of glory, hope's time gage,
And thus I'll make my pilgrimage.

There is nothing in all this to afford us a reasonable clue to the origin of the use of the scallop in coat armour; nor are we much assisted in so doing by the histories of the principal families bearing it in their arms. The Scalases, an ancient baronial family of Norfolk, bore it; but whether in allusion to the name, or the name was derived from the bearing—and, if so, why the latter was adopted it is difficult to say. The probability, however, is, that the name was antecedent to the arms, as the first of the family on record gave to the monks of Lewes certain churches by deed sealed with the impression of an armed man standing on his left foot, and putting his right on the step of a ladder, around which was the inscription "Sigillum St.—— de Scalerus;" and this view of the case is confirmed by the fact of his great-grandson having made a journey to Jerusalem, where he died. The escallops may have been adopted by his descendants then. Villiers, ancestor of the Dukes of Buckingham of that name, followed Edward I. to the Holy Land, and then and there assumed five escallops on a plain cross. Dr. Full says that the will of the bearer was the reason of the bearing, or, if the original assuming of them was from special cause, yet time hath since cancelled it. The arms escallops and name of Dacre are said to have been assumed by an ancestor who served at the siege of Acre, in Palestine. Though sometimes called the cockle-shell, I think the escallop was one of the larger pectinated shells, probably the Pecten major. Some years ago this shell was used in the Highlands for skimming milk. In old times it and a more memorable place, being admitted into the halls of heroes, and was the cup of their festivity when the tribe assembled in the halls of their chieftains, where

They passed round the joys of the shell.

The pectens is said to sail on the surface of the water, and if attacked by an enemy lets down the membrane which nature has provided it for a sail, and drops to the bottom. "Behold," says Barbut, "the splendour of the pectines, which rival the glowing colours of the papilionaceous tribe, as numerous as they are beautiful, flitting from place to place, and may well be called the papiliones of the ocean." To sum up, we have from the legendary tales which we have cited, this one symbolical and poetical, the other utilitarian. It seems evident that the shell was adopted as a pilgrim's badge, and thence introduced into heraldry either as an emblem of difficult and dangerous travel, or from its frequent use to him as a drinking cup in his long and toilsome journeys. F. BROUGHTON.

HOME-GROWN TOBACCO.—It was in 1624 that James I. ordered by proclamation that the tobacco that should be grown in Great Britain, and that none should be imported other than was the produce of Virginia and Bermuda. This prohibition was not intended so much for the advantage of the colonists—although it really was such in effect as it was to facilitate the collection of revenue upon the article, it being evidently more easy to levy a duty at the Customs House upon importation than to collect a tax from every farmer in the country who might be disposed to cultivate tobacco. The same motive, undoubtedly, has induced the Governments of several other European States to prohibit this culture. Tobacco, however, is extensively cultivated in Holland; in the States of the German Confederation; in Alsatia, in Hungary, the Ukraine, and Turkey in Europe. It thrives well as far as the 54th degree of latitude in Mecklenburg and Pomerania.—W. H., Twickenham.

An attempt was made about twenty years ago to grow tobacco in Ireland. It proved very remunerative to the growers, but the authorities interfered to prevent its cultivation. The reasons assigned for prohibiting its home-growth were that it would jeopardise the soil, militate against West India interests, and injure the revenue. I smoked some of the Irish tobacco. I thought it milder than the Virginian or Havannah, but ill-flavoured, and wanting in aroma.—AN OLD SMOKER.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

F. W.—Messrs. Bird and Falkner are so well matched that it is difficult to decide between them. They have now played together in all seventeen games, with the following result: Falkner, 8; Bird, 9; drawn, 0. The next match, which ought to consist of at least twenty-one games, will probably determine who is to be accounted the better player.

And White surrendered.

(a) This reduces the opening at once to the Lopez Knight's Game—a game of all others most difficult and unsatisfactory to the second player.

(b) Q to K 2nd would be very good indeed as to players of eight, it becomes indispensable against the Lopez attack.

(c) The coup juste.

(d) With the view of throwing forward the K R Pawn, and forcing an opening on the adverse King's flank. It was an important move, however—made either with at last considerable or the advantage of offered White, or in culpable reliance on their not seeing the opportunity afforded them.

(e) White is very strong in the hands but, luckily for their adversaries, did not see how to play it. Instead of advancing this Pawn they should have taken the Kt, as per—

| 17. P takes K P | Q P takes P |

(f) This was compulsory.

(g) The proper move was K to B 2nd.

(h) As to K B 2th would leave given Black a drawn game we believe, for instance:—

| 32. B takes R | Q takes B (ch) | 34. Q takes Q Kt | Q to K 8th (ch), &c. |

(i) Fatal error! They should have taken the Rook with their Bishop, and the game would then have proceeded thus:—

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| 31. B takes R | Q Kt to K B 5th | 33. R to K Kt 2nd | Kt takes R |
| 32. Q to Q 2nd (best) | Q takes B (ch) | 34. Q takes Kt | Q to K 8th ch), &c. |

KANSAS DELEGATES AT WASHINGTON.

(From a Correspondent.)

A VERY interesting interview lately took place at Washington between a delegation of Kaw Indians (Kansas) and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The Indians had come from their far-distant homes to pay their great father the President, and arrived just at the time of the inauguration. Being referred to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, they had, in that gentleman's office, a solemn pow-wow. The delegation consisted of four warriors and their interpreter, a half blood, who spoke broken English. The chiefs wore their war-paint, and were dressed in their richest attire. Two of them, "Great Elk" and "Little Dog," sitting to the right hand in the Sketch, were armed with bows and arrows; the two others, "Buffalo" and "Fleet Deer," were only spear and shield. Each in his turn arose, and, after shaking hands with the Commissioner, deposited his pouch at his feet and began his speech, which the interpreter translated as well as he was able. The substance of their speeches was that of late some of the head men had died, that the four chiefs present were candidates for the vacant chieftainship, and wished to know their great father to oblige their tribe to acknowledge their authority. The Commissioner's answer was as follows:—

My Red Brethren,—I have listened to your talk, and reflected on it. You tell me you are each of you a great chief that you are brave in battle and wise in council. You say that you are friends of the white man. How can I tell what the red-skin speak the truth? You come here armed and besmeared with paint. Can I know what lies behind that paint? Is a good Indian or a bad one? Why did you come so far to see me—nearly sixteen hundred miles? Why did you not speak to your father, the Indian agent of your tribe; or, if he could not satisfy you, why did you not go to your father the agent in St. Louis? I am displeased to see you here, without any paper from your father the agent or from your father in St. Louis. If I had not dressed in clean clothes, and my hair washed, I could see whether you are good Indians. In place of talking to me how many scalps you took, you had better have brought paper from your father telling me how many of you had given up the enemy's scalps. I know from reports that you do not drink fire-water, that you go to church, and send your children to school. I am displeased to see you coming thus far, and must see you back to your tribe. I have spoken, and wish you to think over what I have said to you.

The Indians seemed not much edified with what had been said, held a consultation and after a few days they started again for their home in the West. Undoubtedly that which the Commissioner told them was very true, for often some Indians from remote parts of the Union to Washington without any motive but to travel and see the white man's home. Of time the Indian has no idea, twelve months and a thousand miles are to them as twelve hours. Travelling is delight to him; and stage-loads and railroads, and steamboats, take them as their journey may suit entirely. But how would it be if those Indians were disturbed by the white men of their father the agent were a scoundrel, and their other father in St. Louis a still greater rogue, that would cheat them out of their land, and they came to complain before their great father in Washington, and were sent by him back to their home to be judged by their oppressor—what would then remain to the poor red-skin?

M. FATUREAU'S PICTURE GALLERY.—The French Emperor, accompanied by M. Fould, visited the sale-rooms in the Rue Drouot, and examined the picture gallery belonging to M. Faturau, on Saturday last. This collection, composed of sixty-seven paintings of merit, is one of the finest that has been offered for sale in Paris since the dispersion of the Scult Gallery; but the gem is a glorious landscape by Hobbima, known as "The Windmills," for the possession of which a severe struggle is anticipated. Both the French Government and the "National Gallery" authorities are in the field, besides several amateurs with deep purses. Several landscapes by Ruysdael are worthy of a place in our National Gallery, likewise some admirable Ostades. This gallery is rich in the Dutch school, and comprises several tolerable specimens of Miers, Terburg, Teniers, and Vandevelde. The "Hobbima" should be decidedly purchased by England, even if the remaining paintings are not deemed worthy of the high price which they will infallibly fetch. The owner of this gallery, M. Fatureau, is somewhat of an eccentric disposition. He commenced life with a decided passion for horses, which he speedily lost; subsequently he devoted years to the collecting of the picture gallery which has recently been dispersed; and he is now inspired with an intense love for horticulture and cattle breeding.

THE NEW AUSTRIAN STATISTICS.—A few days since a new census law was established. Formerly the census was taken in such a way that the authorities knew where to find the men who were of an age to shoulder the musket, but nothing more. The census will now be taken every six years, except in the military frontier districts—in the following manner:—1. The number of cities, towns, villages, hamlets, and houses will be registered. 2. The number of inhabitants, according to their religion. 3. The number according to their nationality. 4. The number according to their age. 5. The number married or single. 6 The number according to their residence. At the same time statistical information must be given relative to the number of animals kept. The animals which must be entered in the tables are stallions, mares, geldings, foals, mules, asses, bulls, cows, oxen, calves, sheep, goats, and swine. It may be observed that the statistical tables published during the last few years in this empire, might serve as models.—Letter from Vienna.

THE CANADIAN SEAT OF GOVERNMENT QUESTION.

THE people of Canada, as our readers are aware, have been much divided for some time past with regard to the choice of a seat for the Government of that colony. On the 24th ult. the House of Assembly agreed to the following address to her Majesty—sixty-one for and fifty against the resolutions:—

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty.

May it please your Majesty, We, your Majesty's faithful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, humbly approach your Majesty for the purpose of representing:

That the interests of Canada require that the seat of the Provincial Government should be fixed at some certain place.

That we have resolved to appropriate the sums requisite for providing the necessary buildings and accommodations for the Government and the Legislature at such place as your Majesty may see fit to select.

And we humbly pray your Majesty to be graciously pleased to exercise the Royal prerogative by the selection of some one place as the permanent seat of Government in Canada.

Most people seem to think that this is after all the best way to settle the dispute. There are so many clashing interests that, neither within the walls of the Legislature, nor out of doors, is there any practicable method of satisfactorily dealing with the subject. It is believed, therefore, that a reference to her Majesty, and a strongly-expressed desire that she settle for ever this vexata quæstio, is the only really possible way of securing the matter, and of permanently fixing which of the cities of Canada shall obtain the distinguished honour of being hereafter known as the one and undivided metropole of United Canada.

A Correspondent of the Times argues in favour of Ottawa as the new metropolis of the Canadas. He points out its excellent situation in a military point of view, and also its position as the future centre of a thickly-populated country:

The two great rivers, Ottawa and Gatineau, receiving nearly all the waters of the great countries lying to the rear of both the Canadas, and uniting in themselves at this point—a natural network of rivers—give to Ottawa city not only the command of the great Ottawa Valley, but of an immense territory in Central Canada, which is destined at no very distant day to contain a population of many millions, for the Ottawa River is the only great inlet, the only great gate to the interior of British America, and points like the finger of God the way the tide of population must in future flow. Again, the Canadas, though in fact united, are in effect separate. We have two distinct races, two distinct codes of laws, two distinct sets of institutions, and two distinct political creeds. The French, or Lower Canadians, stand up for Lower Canada, the Code Napoleon, the customs of Paris, and the right of ascendancy. The English, or Upper Canadians, for Upper Canada, the Code of Blackstone, the common law and trial by jury, and the right of ascendancy consequently we find these two great parties always arrayed against and jealous of each other, and unable to agree on questions of any importance less either should have the advantage. It was this that forced them to adopt the alternate system of removing the Government every four years from one province to the other. It is this fear of provinces this rivalry of races, and not a rivalry of cities, which has induced them to submit the important question of the seat of Government to the arbitrament of her most gracious Majesty the Queen. Let this decision, then, be in favour of Lower Canada, and you light a volcano in the heart of Upper Canada; let it be in favour of Upper Canada, and you sink a deep well of discontent in the heart of Lower Canada. But let it be in favour of Ottawa, which is situated between the two, with one-half its population French and the other English—let, at this point, where the two provinces are connected by a magnificent suspension-bridge, the Parliament Houses be erected in Upper Canada, and the Governor's Palace or Government House in Lower Canada, and you hush the voice of discontent for ever; sink all that rivalry and jealousy between parties, and unite the two provinces and the two races in a bond that never can be broken.

CONFERENCE OF KAW INDIANS (KANSAS) WITH THE UNITED STATES' COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.—(SEE PRECEDING PAGE.)

Mr. Murray, in his work published on "Cuba, the United States, and Canada," three years since, thus states the advantages of Bytown, now called Ottawa, as the permanent seat of government:—

No place was ever better calculated for the capital of a great country. Bordering upon Upper and Lower Canada, only twelve hours from Montreal, easily capable of defence, with a trade increasing in value as rapidly as the source thereof is inexhaustible, at the confluence of two rivers whose banks are alike rich in timber and arable land, requiring but nineteen miles of lockage to unite the St. Lawrence, the Ottawa, and the Gatineau, with the boundless inland lakes of America, possessing the magnificent Rideau Canal, which affords a ready transport down to Kingston on Lake Ontario, rich with scenery unsurpassed in beauty and grandeur, and enjoying a climate as healthy as any the world can produce. Nature seems to have marked out Bytown for a Canadian metropolis. In short, were I a prophet, instead of a traveller, I should boldly predict that such it must be some day if Canada remained united and independent.

MR. FREDERICK ROBSON, OF THE OLYMPIC THEATRE.

We this week present our readers with a character portrait of Mr. Robson, the serio-comic actor, whose success at the Olympic Theatre has been one of the distinguishing characteristics of histrionic London since 1853, when Mr. Farren was fortunate enough to secure the services of this most genial of English actors. Genial he is, but "with a difference," that is, a peculiarity, which makes the geniality as a special aptitude. We have called him a "serio-comic actor;" and it is the admixture of the grotesque and tragic which this term implies that Mr. Robson's speciality so singularly illustrates. It is not sufficiently known—if at all—that this peculiarity, or rather its manifestation, is due entirely to Mr. Robson's appearance in London. In the provinces the struggling actor had not evinced this curious talent, not only because there was no opportunity for it, but that the thing altogether was an original creation to be spontaneously produced out of the accidents of his London engagement. From 1844 onward Mr. Robson acted for a long period at the Grecian Saloon, where he managed to impress many histrionic compeers with his remarkability, but beyond Wormwood, in "The Lottery Ticket," there was no cardinal manifestation. In 1850 we find him in Dublin, at the Queen's, astonishing the Irish with Jem Baggs, in "The Wandering Minstrel." But out of this nothing original came, and it was by reason of "the original" only that Mr. Robson was destined to achieve his ultimate triumph. Mr. Farren, fortunately for the profession, perceived that his only hope of making the Olympic successful lay in the perpetual production of novelty, and accordingly he produced a series of adaptations and new pieces at that theatre, as he had previously done at the Strand. Much credit is due to Mr. Farren for the boldness with which he daringly experimented in a direction at which less intelligent managers are found to start and grow pale, each "like a guilty thing upon a fearful summons." The only hope of exhibiting genius, however, depends upon such boldness and such daring, grounded upon such intelligence, in managers of theatres; and because all these are so rare in such persons it is that so few examples of what is really good and great in the poetic and histrionic department of productivity are brought before the notice of the public. There is a mine of wealth in the genius of the country not yet explored, on account of the incompetent manner in which our theatres are conducted, and on that account alone. Mr. Farren's liberality presented his audience with two burlesques on "Macbeth" and "Shylock," the heroes of which were confided to Mr. Robson. These original characters brought out the original actor. With no capacity for vulgar imitative burlesque, or with none that he cared to show, Mr. Robson studied the parts in question without any reference to preceding actors, and by merely exaggerating the tragic power, of which he found the elements in his own deeper nature, revealed to wondering criticism a new poetic creation—a new kind of dramatic development, in which the passionate and the humorous were so curiously commingled that men were almost inclined to believe that, in the dramatist of these punning and fustian caricatures, Aristophanes himself had arisen from the Greek Hades, and walked awhile in Wych-street. It is to the credit of Mr. Wigan that, in undertaking the management of the theatre after Mr. Farren, he was not unmindful of his predecessor's excellence, and, in a great degree, was willing to walk in his steps. Mr. Wigan has also depended on novelty, and made his theatre a house for authors as well as actors. And such has been his success that nearly every piece he has produced has had an enormous run. Night after night "Plot and Passion," by Mr. Tom Taylor, though somewhat heavy and drily intellectual in plan and execution, exhibited Mr. Robson in the character of Desmaret, and showed how much he could do with the serious alone. We had then the "Yellow Dwarf," to present him in a picturesque point of view; and, finally, in the "Medea," no doubt was left on the mind of every judicious playgoer that Mr. Robson was more the tragic than the burlesque histrion. We have so lately reviewed his Daddy Hardacre that we will no longer detain the reader with any farther remarks on this topic. Every competent judge is now convinced that, Mr. Robson is a tragic actor of the most intense power. Not a few are anxious to behold him in a real tragic part; and sure we are that he would surpass all competitors in such a rôle. We speak advisedly in saying this. We may add to the present inadequate notice of the merits of a man of real and singular genius, that Mr. Robson's reputation is not confined to London: in Dublin it is great; and in Edinburgh, during Passion Week of the present year, his success was perfectly astonishing. The characters in which he excited such extraordinary enthusiasm were Jasper Touchwood in "Husbmony," and the Medea, in which Ristori is not caricatured so much as she is emulated. Singular position for an histrionic artist, that in burlesquing tragic emotion he should rise, notwithstanding all the drawbacks of extravaganza, to the dignity of the tragedian, and thus by contrast make his victory over stubborn materials "come fiery off," and distance competition altogether. In conclusion we may remark that Mr. Robson was born at Margate in 1821, and is now only in his thirty-sixth year. Thus early in life he has attained an extraordinary fame; and we may, therefore, expect for him both a long and splendid future.

"A FAMILY GROUP."

FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL INSTITUTION.

We engrave, agreeably to the promise we gave in our notice of the above Exhibition, Mr. Willis's admirable picture of Goats. The scene of the background seems to be somewhere on the south coast, judging from the precipitous character of the cliffs, the down covered with sheep, and the bramble blossoming on the left. The group consists, as our readers will see, of a he-goat or, as he is familiarly called, a "billy," a she-goat or "nanny," and her kid. In Britain the goat produces generally two young at a time; and here, besides the kid kneeling to its mother's side, there seems to be another—the scapegrace of the family—who has been wandering, but is now looking down inquiringly from the extreme verge of the eminence on the right as if to ascertain if it is meal-time. Paterfamilias is lying down with an expression of great content, his sagacious eye seeming to give the weight of parental sanction to the proceedings of his gentler partner. And she retracts her keen eye with its dilated oblong pupil, and pricks her ears with much maternal solicitude. The coats of the animals are truthfully painted, with all the shaggy coarseness of our domestic breeds. The hair, however, of the Angora, the Thibet, but, above all, of the Cashmir goats, is of the finest silky texture, and is woven into those celebrated India shawls, of such exquisite beauty and great value. The hair of the goat thus furnishes fabrics as choice as anything from Merino sheep or Alpaca llama. The draught our little kid is quaffing is not only very nutritious to man, but even medicinal.

Besides the utility of the goat, it is interesting as being a favourite subject of pastoral poetry and fable. This (with other genera of the order Ruminantia) is also associated with man in his earliest records; accompanying the Patriarchs in their wanderings; forming one of the subjects of the most acceptable sacrifice, and being made a type and emblem of Him who bare the sins of a guilty world. The "Scapegoat" has, however, been a subject pictorially well treated by Mr. Hunt, in his remarkable work exhibited last year at the Royal Academy. These, then, and many other considerations justify our artist in his choice of subject—and the excellence of his art would lend interest to a much less suggestive theme.

LITERATURE.

A PERSONAL NARRATIVE OF THE DISCOVERY OF THE NORTH-WEST PASSAGE. By ALEX. ARMSTRONG, M.D., R.N. Hurst and Blackett.

This interesting volume, published with the sanction of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, is dedicated to Prince Albert, by the gracious permission of his Royal Highness. It describes the voyage of her Majesty's ship Investigator to ascertain the fate of Sir John Franklin and of his companions, and records the grand triumph of Arctic navigation in the discovery of the North-West Passage, which had been vainly sought after during the long period of three centuries. A clearly-executed chart is prefixed to the volume, giving a complete and distinct view of the track of the Investigator of her consort ship the Enterprise, and of the contributions by Mr Rae in search of Sir John Franklin's party from the Esquimaux. The command of this expedition was intrusted to Captain Richard Collinson, C.B. who selected Mr. Pullen as lieutenant on the Enterprise, and the command of the Investigator was conferred on Captain Robert J. Le Mesurier M'Clure, to whose ship Dr. Armstrong was appointed as surgeon and naturalist. Both vessels were ordered to proceed to Behring's Straits, and enter the Polar Sea from the westward. They sailed from Plymouth on the 19th January, 1850; and on the 6th October, 1853 the survivors landed at Ramsgate, after an absence of four years and ten months.

The interest of the voyage, in reference to its special mission, of course, does not commence till the ship reached the ice; but we cannot pass over unnoticed the visit to Honolulu, where it only to mention that an old woman still lives in a remote part of the island, a native of Owhyhee, who had a clear recollection of the death of Captain Cook, and could narrate the circumstances with great accuracy. It is to be regretted that Dr. Armstrong was unable to have an interview with the queen. Honolulu appears to have almost entirely lost the distinctive features of its ancient character. The government is vested in the King and his Ministers; and, with the exception of Mr. Wyllie, a Scotchman, who is Minister for Foreign Affairs, all the high functionaries of the Crown are missionaries, chosen from the Boston Society, United States, and the whole appears to be under American influence. The clerical discipline exercised is described as severe and inquisitorial, defeating itself by its own rigour, and "tends largely to promote and foster a great amount of secret sin and infamy, which are the worst of evils." Dr. Armstrong observes—

> I have seldom met with a stronger instance of the absurd puritanical laws with which the use of wine and spirits is totally prohibited, under pain of being debarred the rites of baptism, and other privileges pertaining to the Christian religion; and I was informed that a respectable American merchant was anxiously looking out for the arrival of a British man-of-war, bearing a chaplain, that he might have his child, then many months old, baptised—a rite the clergyman of his own Church had refused, because he allowed wine to be drunk in his house.

On the 2nd August, 1850, the Investigator entered the ice, the main pack being visible. The ship was then in latitude 71 deg. 1 min. N., longitude 166 deg. 11 min. W.; and the lofty, impenetrable barrier extended across the path of the explorers in a line from N.W. to S.E. Flocks of walruses were now seen basking in the sunshine, on detached masses of the frozen water. The meat of these animals, called by old sailors "marine beef," is excellent. At Point Drew, a flat promontory—the first party of Esquimaux reached the ship, they thought was a floating island. They came to barter or to trade; and bold and clever fellows they seem to be. Their habitations are "constructed in the form of a yawl, with skins from which the hair has been removed, over a framework of wood: when this cannot be procured, whalebone is substituted. They are in length about twenty-four feet, with a breadth varying from three to four, with seats across, as in our own boats. They manage them with much skill and dexterity; and the paddles, which are always in the hands of the women, propel them with great celerity through the water."

Various tribes of Esquimaux visited the ship; and the account given of them by Dr. Armstrong is extremely interesting—much more copious and discriminating than that given by the lamented Rae, whose valuable work we recently noticed. Indeed, the writer of the present volume had better and more frequent opportunities of observing the habits, character, and physical qualities; and he speaks of them in terms of sympathy which do him honour. Of the women he gives the following description:—

> They had an animated and more intelligent expression than we had seen others of the sex possess, added to a great display of cheerfulness, owing to a most lively manner among themselves. Being desirous of ascertaining their stature, they readily submitted to my measuring them, which appeared to afford them much amusement. They were tatooed on the chin, having on each cheek one half an inch broad in the centre, with a parallel but narrower one on either side of it, a little apart. Some had two vertical lines protruding from either angle of the mouth, which is a mark of their high position in the tribe. Their hands, notwithstanding the great amount of manual labour to which they are subject, were beautifully small and well formed: a description equally applicable to their feet; and their teeth, white and regular, were displayed to considerable advantage in the hearty laugh in which they frequently indulged.

At Point Drew the Esquimaux were a timid race; at Cape Bathurst they were fierce and warlike, though no hostilities ensued. Of these Dr. Armstrong gives the following account:—

> I should proceed to be composed of young active, muscular men, and the women were decidedly better looking, with more vivacity and cheerfulness, than any we had met with. I fancied that I could trace the outline of female features in several of both sexes: the dress of the women I particularly partook in some degree of that worn by the Esquimaux of Point Drew, differing from the costume of their race along the coast. In the men the most striking feature was the absence of the nasal bar of the septum of the nose pierced and transfixed with a piece of ivory, some coarse or four inches long, a blue bead ornamenting either end. Sundry emblems of their success in the chase were worn suspended from their dexterskin coat; chiefly the head and neck of the great northern diver, skins of foxes and ermine, and other small animals all intended to convey an idea of their individual prowess. Tattooing was common among them, and the captors of whales were each honoured with one line extending outwards from the inner angle of the eye across the cheek; for each one taken the captor became entitled to an additional mark.

The interpreter who accompanied the expedition remarked a strong similarity of language between the Esquimaux of Cape Bathurst and those of the coast of Labrador; and Dr. Armstrong infers from their appearance that they are of Mongolian race. "They are met with in the north-eastern extremity of Asia, the Aleutian Islands, along the entire coast of America, and far east and as Greenland, to the south, as Hudson's Bay, and to the north, as far as has yet been explored." We must give one more extract relating to these people as Dr. Armstrong has painted them in the colours of an anatomist and physiologist:—

> They are generally well proportioned, with full, capacious chests and well-shaped limbs. From several measurements which I made, the average height was five feet four and a half inches; but those apparently of Indian origin were rather from five feet seven to eight inches, and in one or two instances even more. The arms were of a length somewhat disproportionate to the size of the body, and the hands and feet small and delicately formed. The head is of good size, rather flat superiorly, but generally developed posteriorly, evidencing a preponderance of the animal passions; the forehead was, for the most part, low and receding in a few it was somewhat vertical, but narrow. The alæ of the expanded nostril, broad lips, and high cheekbones, were well marked; they possess also keen, restless, small black eyes; the external conformation of the ear is unexceptionable. There is generally an absence of beard and whiskers, or they are represented by a few hairs; in the old the growth is more luxuriant. The cavity of the mouth is one of the most capacious I have seen, with a regularly-shaped, powerfully-formed lower jaw, and large, well-formed teeth, the incisors presenting a flattened crown, as if worn down by attrition from frequent mastication of hard substances. The hands and feet are generally small and well formed.

A few months since, when noticing the pretensions of the Hudson's Bay Company to retain their monopoly of trade, we felt it our duty to point out the unjust treatment of the natives, and it is gratifying to us that our charges against them have been confirmed by the authority of Dr. Armstrong. The Esquimaux told him that they were in the habit of going westward to meet a tribe from the Mackenzie River with whom they trade, the latter trading with the Indians, who are in direct communication with the agents of the Hudson's Bay Company. They declared that the Company bartered "fire-water," that is, ardent spirits, rum and pelitries, which the Company have so frequently denied. Our readers may judge what unfair bargains they make with these poor creatures from the fact that they give the native hunters, for three skins of the silver fox, cooking utensils estimated at only eight shillings and sixpence; while the skin of each silver fox is worth, at the annual sales of the Company, as high as twenty-five or thirty guineas. Well may Dr. Armstrong observe on such extortionate traffic, the fruit of monopoly, "how much the condition of these poor creatures might be improved under the influence of free trade."

A residence in the Polar ice is, of course, very monotonous, and cannot afford much variety of incident. Danger always presents itself, and is exciting, but it is little modified in its nature, as it chiefly arises from the motion of the floes and bergs, which menace the ship with destruction; and the perilous encounters with bears, wolves, walruses, and whales. CHINESE CARICATURE OF AN ENGLISH SAILOR.

CHINÉSE CARICATURE OF AN ENGLISH SAILOR.

The accompanying is a Chinese caricature of an English sailor issued during the last year with China, in the province of Che-keang. It describes the British Tar in much the same style as the mythological and other monsters are spoken of in an old Chinese work, called the "Shanhae King; or, Book of Hill and Stream." The descriptive text proceeds:—"This creature appears in the Tsing-teen-heen district of Chee-chow-foo, of the capital of Che-keang Several troops of men surrounding it, it then changes into blood and water. Soldiers should shoot it with fire-arms, for bows and arrows are unable to injure it. When it appears, the people and troops should be informed that whoever is able to destroy or ward it off will be most amply rewarded. If the monster find itself surrounded by soldiers, it turns and falls into the water. When it meets any one it forthwith eats him. It is truly a wonderful monster.' As a specimen of caricature, and as showing the terms and exaggerated notions which prevailed on the east coast of China, it is a curious illustration of the immense self-humiliation of the Chinese which prevailed at the capture of Chinghe-keang-foo. The smoke from the mouth is probably meant for fumes of tobacco.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL'S REPORT.—The third report of the Postmaster-General on the Post-office, presented to Parliament by command of her Majesty, has just been printed. It commences with noticing the extension of inland service during the last year, in which period 368 post-offices have been added, making the whole present number in the United Kingdom 10,866. The establishment of pillar-boxes is noticed as a successful experiment, and it is intended in a short time to put up a large additional number in London, Dublin, and Edinburgh, and in various parts of the country. The measures adopted for accelerating the delivery of letters in London including the sorting of country letters before they reach town, and the division into postal districts—have been so far successful that the morning delivery of letters commences 33 minutes earlier and is completed 45 minutes earlier than before. The conveyance of mails, exclusive of steam-vessels, and not counting the walks of letter-carriers, within the United Kingdom extends to over a distance of 61,000 miles per day, being about 2600 miles more than in the end of 1855. The number of letters delivered in England last year amounted to 588 millions, being an increase of about 5¼ per cent on the preceding year. The letters delivered in Ireland in the same period were 42,000,000, and in Scotland 48,000 000; the former being an increase of only 1-25 per cent, and the latter 4¾ per cent on the year preceding. The proportion of letters is in England 20 to each person, in Ireland 7, and in Scotland 16. The reduction of the postage on letters to India from 1s. to 6d., made in the beginning of the year, has already caused an increase from 800,000 to nearly 1,100,000. The correspondence with France has also increased, owing to the reduction of postage, about 1,000,000, or nearly one-third of the whole former number. The interruption of the packet service to the United States consequent on the exigencies of the late war, caused a considerable diminution in the correspondence, and, though last year there was an increase of 125,000 letters, the number is still considerably less than it was before the interruption. The number of newspapers which passed through the Post-office last year is estimated at 71,000,000. Of letters returned, owing to imperfect directions, there were about 2,400,000, and of newspapers 350,000. The money transmitted through the agency of money-order offices amounted last year to £11,805,622 for the United Kingdom, and the profit from the transmission, after deducting all expenses, was £22,674. The gross revenue of the Post-office last year is stated to have been £2,957,854, being an increase of 5¾ per cent As compared with the first year of penny postage (1840), the gross revenue was increased by 11¼ per cent, and, even as compared with the last year of high rates of postage, there has been an increase of 26 per cent. The report notices the continued practice of sending money and other valuables in unregistered letters as offering great temptation to theft, and as not unfrequently causing groundless suspicion. Numerous instances are mentioned of blame being attached to the Post-office, and to the letter-carriers, when the faults arose from negligence of the parties sending the letters, or from the roguery of the persons to whom they were intrusted to be put into the Post-office. The recent recommendation to adopt district burials in letters has been responded to very satisfactorily. Already about 55,000 letters daily, or one-third of those posted in the London districts, are so addressed.

THE MONKS AND THE PRESS.—The Capucine Monks of Grasse, in fair Provence, have afforded another absurd proof of the spreading intolerance of a fraction of the clerical party in France. These individuals, after having denounced from the pulpits as criminal the modern literature of the country (including the works of Thiers and Lamartine), called upon the parishioners to deliver up to them all the books unconnected with religious subjects that they might possess. On Easter Thursday, at nine in the evening, a procession, headed by three stupid friars, proceeded to one of the market places of the town, where a stake had been prepared for all the books, including the history of the revolution by Thiers, the poetry of Lamartine, and Balzac's works, with a heap of productions by Dumas, Sue, and G. Sand, were then thrown with much ceremony into the flames.

FEROUK KHAN AND LORD STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE.—The Journal de Teheran received by the last Levant mail contains a note from Ferouk Khan to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, from which it appears that, during his stay at Constantinople, the Persian diplomatist evinced the most conciliatory spirit, and the most pacific disposition, in all his negotiations with the British Ambassador. But, being at last out of all patience with Lord Stratford's obstinacy, he told him that, in consequence of his systematic refusal to give any answer to the successive propositions made, he should withdraw the concessions which he had offered to make for the sake of peace, and should proceed at once to France. This document proves clearly that Lord Palmerston wilfully distorted facts when he told the House of Commons that Lord de Redcliffe was in no way responsible for the rupture of the negotiations.—Assemblée Nationale.

THE MOUCHARDS OF PARIS.—Apropos to the very considerable alarm felt by the entourage of the Tuileries latterly touching the Emperor's personal safety, I think it a possible your readers may be amused by an account of what I am myself a personal witness to. Three days ago, whilst walking in the Rue Royal with a friend, my attention was called by the latter to a gentleman who was walking leisurely some paces before us. "Do you know who that is?" was the question put to me; and, to my negative reply, "If you have any curiosity about him," added my friend, "we will join him, and make him talk upon a subject very familiar to his understanding." He is no other than M——, one of the prefects of police of the Republic of 1848, who held the position for the longest period of time, and best discharged that very difficult office." (of course I profited by my friend's proposal. We joined M.: and, the mutual presentations effected, we journeyed on, all three together, up the Champs Elysées, and on to the outer side of the Arc de Triomphe; after which we redescended the Champs Elysées by the side opposite to that by which we had entered them. Our subject of conversation soon became that by which I commenced my récit—the anxiety manifested by the Government touching the Emperor's safety. "Yes," remarked our new companion, "I do not need to be apprised of that; I need only look around me as I walk," and this phrase our interlocutor explained thus "If I feel any interest to you, I will point out, as we go along, the individuals, under every imaginable disguise, who, some few years since, were the soldiers of my army. They are everywhere, and by twenties, thirties, hundreds; they are lounging, or walking quick, apparently hurried by business; old and young, rich, poor, sick or healthy, listening to you and me as we converse, prying, spying, watching all around;" and, in truth, it was high measure to see the men M. pointed out to us, and with whom he every now and then exchanged an imperceptible sign of recognition. Out of those that struck me most I will notice a few. One was a lame beggarman, who went halting along with a most piteous mien, and who, our informant told us, was remarkably clever at his trade. "Observe," he said, "how he always contrives to stop and seem to rest himself whenever two and three men meet upon the foot pavement and begin to talk: he is listening to what they say." Another was also very ingenious. This was an elderly-looking invalid, closely wrapped up, attended by a livery servant, and who had ensconced himself in one of the now very comfortable chairs that garnish the Grand Avenue. He had placed himself in the very middle of a group of sitters of both sexes, whom the first rays of this premature sunshine had seduced to what are usually the haunts of a month later. Others, again, and a great many, were dressed as workmen some in blouses, some in working jackets, several were attired in "shabby genteel" costume, looking like poor professors or employés whilst some were as elegantly dressed and appeared as gentlemanlike as the generality of dancers in Paris ball-rooms. "The place where you may see the most of these gentry," said M., "is if you will come as far as the round point of the Champs Elysées—the fountain. It is their gathering place, they know that, in the course of the day, they can always be sure to find each other there." Sure enough, when we reached the fountain, we found a small circle of these police heroes; and, as we approached, our informant designated them to us. "You see the seedy-looking man with a bundle of papers under his arm, the journeyman painter lolling against the edge of the basin, the dandy examining the play of the water through his eye-glass, and that tall raw ragged youth trying to make a bit of a boat sail along. Well, I know every man of them. They are all mouchards" (police spies). As we passed quite close to these individuals, we noticed that our companion was evidently known to them; but, as he himself remarked, "they did not venture to bow" to him. Further on, however, close to the triumphal arch, we met an elderly man, dressed extremely well, and carrying "respectability" on his every feature. "To this one, if you like," said M., "I will speak;" and accordingly he accosted him thus. "Well, so and so, this you carry on your trade still? I should have thought it was pretty nearly time to retire from business." "Ah, monsieur Préfet" was the answer of the man, who could not make up his mind to treat as an ordinary mortal him who had once been his immediate superior; "I really cannot consent to give up my young men (mes jeunes gens) to the fair ladies; they interest me; not that they are worth much but they interest me que voulez vous? I have the habit of them." This needs explanation. The man in question is especially charged to watch over certain classes of ladies in their relationships with young men of family; his observations all went to prove that never in any time had the youth of France been so immoral, so degraded; but he always ended by saying that he could not give them up yet, because he had "the habit of them." —Paris Correspondent of the Manchester Guardian.

AN AMERICAN DUEL.—The Baltimore Republican gives an account of an extraordinary and fatal duel which occurred at Winton (Maryland. The parties were fastened down by their trousers to a two-inch oak plank, and fought with bowie-knives. "They fought," says the Republican, "until Drain was mortally wounded. Young Pendleton was cut nearly to pieces, and now lies in a critical position Part of Pendleton's knee is still in Drain's head There is no hope of his recovery. The doctors think they will both die. Drain was twenty two, and Pendleton nineteen RUSSIAN INTRIGUES AGAINST TURKEY.—A Vienna correspondent, who is usually well informed, writes to the Frankfort Post Zeitung as follows:—"Our papers seem not to understand the merits of the Montenegro question, but what is going on is well known to me Russia tried to annihilate Turkey she will now endeavour to dismember her. It is the task of Greece to separate Epirus, Thessaly, and Macedonia from the Ottoman Empire. The projected Danube State (Moldavia and Wallachia) will endeavour to unite with Bulgaria, and Montenegro is the point from which the seeds of discontent were to have been carried into these districts in Bosnia, the Herzegovina, and Albania that are inhabited by Greek Christians. The offer of Prince Daniel to recognise the suzerainty of the Porte, if the means of living in peace and quiet are given to his subjects, interferes with the plans of the Russians, and hence the violent attacks which are made on him and his brother Murko." There is reason to believe that the Porte would not be disinclined to give to Prince Daniel as its vassal, sixty square English miles of grazing and arable land, and to furnish him with the means of maintaining his Princely dignity with out having recourse for pecuniary assistance to a foreign Power.

PROGRESS OF THE CHINESE DISPUTE.

THE country is evidently but at the beginning of war with the Chinese. While successive accounts bring no confirmation of the previous announcements that the Emperor was anxious to disavow the proceedings of Yeh and to confine the dispute to Canton, they divulge a state of feeling on the part of the Chinese towards Europeans, which is ominous of future perplexity, ill-will, and bloodshed. The most intense ignorance, the most insufferable conceit, and a brutal ferocity—compared with which, that of the Kaffirs or any other savages on the face of the earth is dignified and manly—are united in this extraordinary people, to a malignity and a cunning for which no parallels can be found among the human race. It is unfortunate that Great Britain should be at war with such a nation; but it must be obvious by this time to the majority of Englishmen—as it is to the Americans, French, Portuguese, Dutch, and every other people who have had experience of them—that, being at war, we must chastise them effectually; and that nothing but condign punishment will teach them to respect us. To have submitted to the insolence of Yeh,—as so many members of the late Parliament would have done, we may judge of them by their votes on Mr. Cobden's motion,—would but have encouraged that bloody-minded fanatic to insolence still greater. Acquiescence in small wrongs would have drawn down still greater indignities upon the heads of the British merchants. The forbearance of our Government would have been attributed to cowardice. The patient endurance of injury and contumely would, in Chinese estimation, have been an avowal of our hopeless and contented inferiority; and the end would, in all probability, have been either a general massacre of Europeans, or some outrageous and intolerable insult against which even Mr. Cobden or Mr. Gladstone would have revolted. Given such a people as the Chinese, and such a people as either the British or the Americans to trade with them, and war, sooner or later, was as certainly to be calculated as the return of spring and summer, an eclipse of the moon, or the solution of an algebraic problem. There are many Englishmen who wish that the origin of the existing dispute had been simpler and clearer; there are few who are not convinced that ultimate hostilities against the Chinese were inevitable, not only in the interests of Great Britain, but in those of Europe and of all Christendom.

Before the activity of the European, and especially of the British, mind was devoted so largely to those industrial and scientific pursuits to which the world owes the marvellous development of the railway system, the progress of steam navigation, and—greatest wonder of all—the electric telegraph, China was in a remote corner of the world. It was not in the highway of nations. It stood apart, and retarded neither the business nor the progress of humanity. But in these days no part of the world can be called remote. China is in the very highway of commerce. It is our near neighbour in India. It is the halfway house both to Australia and to California; and supplies to civilised nations an article of large domestic consumption which, for good or for evil, the world can no longer do without. Circumstances are so altered that the nonconformity of China to the world's laws and the world's duties is an injury to all other nations. The more the trade and intercourse of the world increases, the more severely the nuisance of the system adopted towards foreigners by the Chinese is aggravated; and year after year, especially since the discovery of gold in Australia and California, it has become evident to all the Governments of Europe—with the exception, perhaps, of Russia, which is half Tartar, and trades with the Chinese Tartars overland through Siberia—that China must not be allowed to shut herself up in her ancient isolation, or to assume towards nations infinitely her superiors, in wealth, intellect, power, and civilisation, a position of irritating contempt and obstructive policy. There are casuists who, no doubt, maintain the legal right of the Chinese to do as they please—to refuse to trade with Europeans—to prohibit the entrance either of "barbarian" ships or of "barbarian" men into their territories—to live for themselves alone—to contribute nothing to the building of lighthouses on their dangerous coasts, or to the police of the seas; and to withdraw themselves entirely from the great family of man. But we deny the moral right of any such course of policy. Any nation so acting becomes ipso facto a nation of outlaws. The abstract right of a man or a nation to do as he likes with his own is a right that is subject to very large modifications. It is a right which the Chinese have scandalously abused, upon system and as a mode of government; and if they choose to persist in it, in despite of the world's interests and remonstrances, they must take the consequences.

Great Britain is well able to fight out single-handed the war into which she has so reluctantly been dragged by the pig-headed obstinacy of Yeh; but there is an evident desire on the part of the United States and of France to have a share in the undertaking. Even Russia, according to some accounts, sees another "sick man" in the far East;—and is anxious to be in at the death. Those great States—and we need not, perhaps, except Russia from the list—have their grievances to complain of as well as we have, and are interested as much as we are in binding over the Chinese to keep the peace and to take guarantees from them for the proper performance of the duties of citizenship. As the work has begun, it will proceed, and, either by peaceful negotiation or by the power of the strong arm, China will be "opened up," and compelled to submit to the laws which govern the general polity of nations. If bloodshed be the consequence, the guilt will be on the head of those who have so perversely provoked it. On every consideration of humanity and mercy it were to be wished that the Emperor of China would see the interest of his empire in conforming to the reasonable requirements of that great human family which exists beyond the boundaries of China, although he and his predecessors have so stupidly ignored it. Such a change in his external relationships could not but be conducive to the interests and to the improvement of his people, while it might, perhaps, be equally conducive to the stability of his own throne—which now totters before the assaults of internal foes. Rotten within, in consequence of its own inherent, and apparently incurable, vices—and despised and hated without, by all nations whom it has offended and outraged, the Chinese Empire seems destined either to fall, or to undergo great changes. One thing is clear, that unless the Emperor speedily makes peace with England there will be a league of Christendom against him; and that England will, sooner or later, be aided in the struggle by France and America. England needs neither of them, but it will not be her duty or her interest to dissuade them from pursuing their own quarrel, or from having a hand in a business which, in reality, concerns them as well as every civilised and trading nation.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.—Mons. Dubufe's fine historical picture, "The Peace Conference at Paris in 1856," the property of the Emperor of the French, has been removed to Messrs. Colnaghi's, Pall-mall East, previous to being engraved, where it will be on view for a few days. The subject is treated with great breadth, and the portraits individually are full of character.

BOILER EXPLOSION AT WOLVERHAMPTON (See page 410).—The Coroner's jury have returned the following verdict:—"The deceased persons came to their death in consequence of injuries received by the explosion of a certain boiler upon the premises of Benjamin Mason, and such explosion was caused by the negligence of the engineer, Benjamin Mason in not supplying the engine with water, and the jury beg to call the attention of the Government to the dangerous practice at present practised by persons having the management of engines and boilers, and they would insist upon their being certificated persons; and they think the appointment of an inspector for this neighbourhood, to superintend engines and boilers, would have the effect of reducing the number of such occurrences as the present."

THE ART-TREASURES EXHIBITION ### AT MANCHESTER.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

MANCHESTER, Thursday.

It is now little more than twelve months since that a meeting was held in this city, which attracted at the time no public attention, and the proceedings of which were recorded in a few brief sentences in the local newspapers. That meeting is destined to become an interesting historical event. The persons assembled on that occasion consisted of some dozen or more of practical men of business; and they met for the purpose of hearing from a gentleman of indomitable energy and unwearied activity the "reason why" there should be held in Manchester an Exhibition of the Art-Treasures of the United Kingdom. Mr. J. C. Deane—for such was that gentleman's name—told his auditors, on the authority of Dr. Waagen and others, that there were in this country objects of art which exceeded in interest and value those of any other nation in the world; that, while other countries had gathered their works of art into national museums, and galleries, our best treasures of art were in the hands of private and wealthy individuals. It was also stated that the owners of these works of art had always shown the utmost liberality in lending these treasured objects for exhibition, and especially when they were intended to be seen by the humbler classes of the community; and, believing that such liberality would again be evinced, Mr. Deane submitted a scheme for an Exhibition at Manchester, to be called "The Art-Treasury of the United Kingdom." This "Art Treasury" was to contain some of the choicest works of the old masters, specimens of the schools of modern painters, articles of costume, armoury, jewels, household decorations, and other articles which would serve to illustrate the customs and habits of our ancestors. The meeting was further assured of the probability—nay, the absolute certainty—that such an exhibition as that proposed would be successful in a financial point of view; and, on the 28th of March, 1856, it was resolved that an Exhibition of the Art-Treasures of the United Kingdom should be held in Manchester in 1857.

THE EXHIBITION BUILDING.

Having decided upon holding the Exhibition, and the necessary funds having been secured, the next step was to find a site suitable for the purpose. What was required was "an atmosphere pure from smoke and dust, so far as that object can be obtained within any reasonable distance; direct conveyance of all packages, and their safe delivery at the building itself into the hands of proper persons attending on the spot to receive them, without charge of carriage; facility of early examination on delivery; the desirableness of receiving the packages as short a time as possible before the opening of the Exhibition, and the consequent necessity of rapid delivery of many hundreds of cases in a short time."

Each and all of these conditions appeared to be admirably fulfilled in a spot of ground of about twenty-seven acres at Old Trafford, lying about two miles west of Manchester, and completely out of the influence of that smoke-cloud which hovers darkly over the vast "Cottonopolis." The prevalence, too, of the westerly winds exercises a salutary influence in keeping this nuisance away from the Exhibition. The ground is admirably adapted for the purpose. The small junction of Altrincham Railway connects the London and North-Western and the whole network of Lancashire and Yorkshire Railways with the Grand Junction, Birkenhead, and Cheshire lines. There is no part of the United Kingdom from which direct communication may not be had with the Exhibition; while, to render the communication still more complete a siding has been constructed, which runs along a covered platform leading direct into the building. On the north side of the Exhibition there are the Botanic Gardens, which may be entered from the Exhibition. In respect to the immediate vicinity of these beautiful grounds, laid out with admirable taste, and the great facility afforded by the railways, the Manchester Exhibition resembles very closely the Crystal Palace, Sydenham. Art and nature combine to please and to instruct the mind, and mechanical science affords the means of obtaining ready access to the stores of gratification thus provided. There are, besides, two very excellent road-approaches to the Exhibition—one by the Dun Edin road, near the junction of the Stretford new road and the Chester road; and the other, by a short street from the Stretford road, between Old Trafford House and Dun Edin.

The building (designed by Messrs. Young and Co., of Edinburgh,) as will be seen from the accompanying Sketch of the Ground Plan, is in its external form a parallelogram, 656 feet in length and 200 in width, and covering, with the offices, an area of 150,000 square yards, or something more than three acres. The building consists of a large Central Nave and two Side Aisles, intersected by a Transept running east and west. Viewed externally, the east façade represents three semicircular arched roofs, connected by lower intermediate buildings, the central one covering the Nave or Great Hall, and the two side arches the Picture Galleries. The façade is formed of white relieved with red bricks. All the arches are filled in at the upper portion with ornamental fan-light windows, and over the central window are the words, "Exhibition of Art-Treasures of the United Kingdom." The building is extended on the front by two wings corresponding in style of construction to the façade itself. The south wing, 150 feet in length, is used as stores and minor offices; and the north wing, of 150 feet, forms a corridor connected with the platform on the railway, thus presenting a front 446 feet in length. The eastern façade of the building is also of brick; and the sides are formed of sheets of corrugated iron, which fit into grooved columns. The semicircular roofs are covered with corrugated iron up to two thirds of their extent, when glass takes the place of iron. Entering the building, it will be seen that the iron ribs which carry the roof of the Central Hall spring from rows of double columns tied together by means of very neat capitals, and from it centres of light cast iron girders, which rest upon these columns. As each pair of columns is twenty-four feet apart, the ribs of the roof are, therefore, at twelve feet distance. Purlins, running Lengthwise along the roof, divide it into three rows of compartments or panels, producing a remarkably pleasing effect and destroying the monotony which would otherwise prevail in the appearance of the roof. The span of the Central Arch is 96 feet, but a space of 24 feet on the outer side of the supporting columns gives a total Width for the Central Hall of 104 feet. The Picture Galleries at each side are constructed in a similar manner, with the exception that the supporting ribs of the roof are not seen to rest upon columns, as in the case of the Great Hall. The length of the Great Hall is 633 feet; its extreme width is, as stated, 104 feet. The North and South Transepts, similarly continued to the Nave, are 200 feet in length, and of the same width as the Nave. The Picture Galleries are 432 feet in length, and 48 feet in width. A light gallery runs round the Transepts and the west end of the building, and there is a small gallery crossing the Great Hall at the eastern entrance. The length of the Western Gallery is 648 feet, and of the Eastern 504. In both cases the width is 24 feet, and they are raised 15 feet above the hall floor. The centre of the Great Hall from the floor to the crown of the arch is 80½ feet—the same as the Transept of King John, from Lynn, and the crosier of William of Wykeham, from Christ Church, Oxford. There are cases of glass, of enamels of rare value, of porcelain, of Dresden, Chelsea, and Sèvres; the lustrous and Oriental porcelain cases of curious metalwork. There is the world-famed Douce collection of ivories, and the valuable armoury from Goodrich Court. The Museum of Art is in itself an exhibition which would alone merit a visit from London, and would repay hours and days of careful and attentive study.

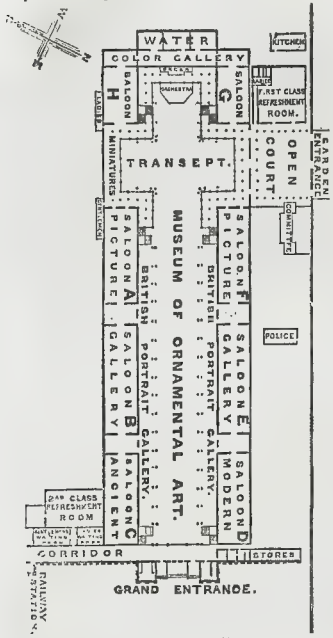
But much yet remains to be glanced at. The Water-Colour Galleries are filled with the finest specimens of art; and one might linger for hours in examining the beauties of Turner, Cattermole, Copley Fielding, Roberts, Hunt, Calleott, Prout, or inspecting the earliest of water-colours by the venerable Paul Sandby, the founder of British water-colour drawing. The Court of Engravings, too, has attractions which must not be overlooked. Rare copies are to be met with—old works of Ephraim Bonus, proofs by Bonasone, early mezzotints by Von Siegen, Earldom, Rupert, and others; and some of the finest works which in later times have served to make the British public conversant with the beauties of some of the finest compositions of the painter.

Last, but by no means the least in its interest, is the Gallery devoted to the fascinating art of the Photographer. Those who may recollect the grim, shadowy, Rembrandt-looking pictures which but a short time since they were told were portraits will see the extraordinary advance which has now been made in photography, and the extended uses to which it is applied. Here are to be met with, in addition to several hundred of pleasing and truthful portraits, by Lake, Mayall, Claudet, and others, copies of sketches of the drawings of Raphael, architectural views, pieces of Alpine scenery presented with all that ruggedness of form and fantastic outline which baffle the powers of the ablest artist. This collection of photographs is placed in the gallery at the west end of the building, and the specimens have been selected with great care, and at immense trouble, by Mr. De la Motte, of King's College. The largest contributors in this, as in many other of the departments, are her Majesty and Prince Albert.



PLAN OF THE BUILDING.

We subjoin a plan of the building, corrected to the last moment. Saloon H will contain the pick of the far-famed Hertford Collection. The open court leads immediately to the Botanic Gardens, enabling visitors to step in twenty steps from all that is exquisite in Art to all that is beautiful in Nature.

THE SOCIETIES OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.—The Exhibitions of the two Societies opened on Monday: the collections contain an unusually large number of works of first-class merit; but we are unavoidably compelled to defer our account of both exhibitions until next week.

BANQUET AT SOUTHAMPTON TO LORD CHIEF JUSTICE COCKBURN.—The building known in Southampton as the Audit Hall was on Saturday evening the scene of a banquet of an interesting character. For ten years the present Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas was the representative in Parliament of the borough of Southampton. Sixteen years since he filled the office of Recorder. The Chamber of Commerce of that town, anxious that this double connection should not pass away without some ceremonial parting, determined on inviting his Lordship to a public dinner; and so popular was the suggestion that the list was speedily filled up with the names of men of all parties in politics. As a general rule the Judges do not dine in public except at the Mansion-house, but in this case the strict judicial etiquette was departed from, as not only did the Lord Chief Justice accept the invitation of his old constituents, but he was accompanied by Mr Justice Williams and Mr Baron Bramwell, who both bore earnest testimony to the fact that the popularity which had marked his Lordship's forensic and Parliamentary career had not deserted him since his elevation to the Bench. His Lordship, during his speech, justified the proceedings of our authorities in China.

ATROCIOUS TRADE OUTRAGE AT SHEFFIELD.—Another of those acts of violence for which Sheffield has gained so disgraceful a notoriety has been committed, by blowing up a house in Bramber-street, occupied by George Gillott, a file-grinder. Gillott, who was sleeping with his wife in the front bed-room, was awoke on Saturday morning, about twenty minutes past one, by hearing a noise as of some one hammering at the cellar-grating beneath the window; and in about a minute an explosion took place, which shook the foundations of the house, and alarmed the whole neighbourhood. Gillott and his wife immediately got up and proceeded down-stairs, where they had considerable difficulty in making their way through the ruins. Upon investigation of the premises, it was evident that a quantity of combustible material had been put through the cellar window. A tin bottle, with the mouth blown off, was found lying in the cellar; and the explosion had no doubt been managed—as many others in the neighbourhood have been—by fastening to the mouth of the bottle a fuse connected with the deadly material inside, setting fire to the fuse and leaving it to do its work of mischief. So far as the destruction of property is concerned, the malicious object of the attack was obtained, the floor and walls of the sitting-room and kitchen, with the furniture being blown to pieces, and other damage done in other apartments. Though several persons were sleeping in the house, none were hurt. The outrage is supposed to have been committed owing to Gillott having declined to pay to the union connected with his trade. A man named Royston has been apprehended on suspicion. Some time ago he and Gillott had a quarrel, which the prisoner used some threats.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

NOTWITHSTANDING the lamented though looked-for death of the Duchess of Gloucester (the last survivor of the many children of King George III., and with whom how many recollections worth remembering must have died), the Manchester Art-Treasures Exhibition will open on Tuesday next. Manchester on that day will be filled with eager gazers—Peers and Peeresses fresh from Tyburnia and Belgravia—rich merchants from Liverpool—influential commoners from the newly-elected Parliament—grave lawyers from the four Inns of Court—learned physicians in full practice—

Chiefs out of war, and statesmen out of place—

poets no longer poor—artists rich with Lancaster prices for cabinet pictures—dealers richer still in foreseeing a rich harvest—connoisseurs wishing to inform and to be informed—collectors with and without envy of others' possessions—critics willing to learn and willing to find fault—people of every class, from London, Edinburgh, and Dublin—distinguished foreigners from Continental cities—goldsmiths, jewellers, nay, pawnbrokers—the pink of Glasgow and Birmingham—men from Huddersfield and Exeter—and

All that beauty or that wealth e'er gave to those pleasant retreats in the vicinity of Manchester—Alderley, Bowdon, and Staleybridge

As the day draws near the wealth intrusted to the Committee exceeds even the most eager expectation. Mr. Deane, in his most sanguine mood, could hardly have foreseen such an El Dorado as his wand and Manchester influence have brought together into a fairy palace standing on a site where, some nine months ago, the youth of Manchester played at cricket, and went in for long runs with all the zeal and activity of Lord Kilmurrey or the Earl of Stamford and Warrington. As we passed through Manchester on Thursday we were once and literally delighted with the appearance of the palace. The Committee-men have stripped to their work. Each man labours in this artistic factory at long factory hours. The Directors of the several departments toil in honourable emulation one with another. When Mr. Scharf is seen beaming with delight at the acquisition of a Luini or a Lucas van Leyden, Mr. Egg is equally radiant with a glow of satisfaction on obtaining a Reynolds or a Wilkie. The face of Mr. Holmes beams with renewed satisfaction over a rare Girtin, or a rarer Marc Antonio. Mr. Waring looks ten inches taller when Mr. Deane's whistle announces a banap or a crosier. Mr. Cunningham hurries from one end of the building to the other to welcome at the door, like a master of the ceremonies, a Cotterell or a Finett, a Duchess of Cleveland or a Nell Gwyn; Mr. Redford (a lighter weight) runs much more nimbly to receive a rich hanging, or a rarer cabinet; and Mr. Dudley (the youngest of the Directors) assists in carrying a marble Venus or Euphrosyne with the enthusiasm of a Townley and the strength of a pocket Hercules. Nor were these pleasant assurances of success all that was noteworthy on Thursday last. The Marquis of Hertford's Collection will find a fitting retreat of its own, so oppressed is Mr. Scharf with early Italian and German examples. The Dutch school is so amply and importantly represented that it has demanded, as a necessity, a separate gallery for itself. The Canalettis are so fine and numerous that they, too, are hung by themselves. The miniatures almost defy enumeration, as they will defy, in the first instance, anything like cataloguing. Mr. Colnaghi, an early and a late worker, was never so hard worked before; and as for Mr. John Scott, honourably known in all matters of art, he has toiled with the useful activity of ten enthusiasts.

The new numbers of the Edinburgh and Quarterly are both good—that is, both readable. We like particularly the Edinburgh article on the Dilettanti Society, written with the knowledge of an inquiring member, and a hearty relish for the days of Sir Francis Dashwood and Viscount Galway. The picture it presents is not to be found elsewhere: the points are worth telling, and they are told well. All, however, is not told: these are days of delicacy; and the Dilettanti—whatever it is now—were not, when first established, a very delicate society. There was a touch of Medmenham Abbey in all its doings.

Book collectors in England and America will read with regret that old Mr. Evans of Pall-mall, the well-informed auctioneer of books—whose intelligent hammer dispersed many a fine library at high prices—was gathered to his fathers of the hammer—Langford, Cock, Paterson, and Leigh—on the 25th of last month, in the eightieth year of his age. He was the son—to give his parentage in a few words—of Evans's "Old Ballads"—that Evans who gave us a very agreeable supplement, in four volumes, to Percy's admirable "Reliques." Our clever portly little friend was full of information on matters of book lore worth preserving. He could have talked in less than a summer week an admirable volume of "Notes" worth preserving. He knew many people of name, and told a story well. For fifty years he filled an auctioneer's pulpit, and wielded in a winning way an auctioneer's hammer. He has a right to mention also as an author; he did good service in revising a second edition of his father's old ballads; and the valuable "Explanatory Description of Gilray's Caricatures," published by Mr. Bohn, came from his pen. We have seen him in friendly converse with Heber and Mackintosh. There are others happily alive who have seen him exchanging information with Ritson and Duke of Roxburgh. Inferior to Rodd in wide and accurate knowledge of the contents of books, he was not surpassed by any other old bookseller, or literary auctioneer, of the last half-century. We express, we believe, the general opinion of his brethren of the hammer.

The electric wires from Manchester carried the other day an order from Mr. Agnew to buy Mr. Millais's smaller picture, in the approaching Royal Academy Exhibition, for a thousand guineas. Wires from London said it was worth that amount, and Mr. Agnew, without seeing the picture, replied, "Buy and sign a cheque for the amount."

PHOTOGRAPHY.—This truly delightful art is ever achieving new wonders, as we now see in specimens before us, where Nature, in all her momentary aspects, is arrested in her very smiles and frowns. The studies of clouds and country scenery, by Mr. Scott Archer, Mr. Fenton, Mr. De la Motte, and other artists, afford charming illustrations of this. Again, in Mr. Sharp's process, we have the successful application of photographic drawing upon that hitherto stubborn material, wood. Quite a rage appears to have set in for the publication of portraiture of literary and other eminent public men. Messrs. Mudl and Blyblank are, if possible, more happy than ever in their portraits just published of Mr. George Cruikshank, and our great post-office reformer, Rowland Hill. Such portraits show d be preserved in the portfolios of every collector. They are published at a remarkably small price, which places them within the reach of all. Mr. Mayall and Mr. Watkins announce portraits of our statesmen at prices which will command a large sale. We sincerely regret to add that one to whom photography owes much for having so successfully applied his discovery of the collodion medium to the art, Mr. Frederick Scott Archer, is stricken down with a malady that his friends greatly fear will prove mortal. We trust that all photographers will rally round him in the hour of need, and that the long-talked-of testimonial he will live to receive at their hands.

THE installation of Cardinal Morlot as the fourteenth Archbishop of Paris took place at Notre Dame last week.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Shortly after two o'clock the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Argyll, Earl of Harrowby, Lord Stanley of Alderley, and Earl Spencer, the Commissioners appointed to open the new Parliament, took their seats on the woo sack immediately in front of the throne. The only other Peers present at the time were Earl Beauchamp, Lord Penmure, the Marquis of Huntly, Lord Belper, Lord Godolphin, and the Bishop of Gloucester. Sir A. Clifford, Usher of the Black Rod, being commanded to summon the Commons, several members of that House a few minutes afterwards appeared at the bar, amongst whom were Sir G. Grey, Sir C. Wood, Mr. V. Smith, Mr. Fitzroy, Sir R. Peel, &c.

The LORD CHANCELLOR then read the writ for directing the Commons to retire for the purpose of being sworn in, and then to proceed to elect a Speaker, and who is to be presented at the bar of the House to-morrow, at two o'clock.

The members of the House of Commons having then retired, the Lord Chancellor and the other Peers present were sworn in. Some other noble Lords were afterwards sworn, and the House adjourned to two o'clock next day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The members began to assemble shortly after one o'clock, and the next hour was spent in congratulations of old members to new members, and new members to old. Lord Palmerston entered the House at half-past two o'clock, and was received with loud cheers. Sir Denis Le Marchant, the Chief Clerk, presided at the table.

Lord HARRY VANE said that, in conformity with the instructions contained in the commission which they had just heard read, he presented himself to the House for the purpose of proposing a Speaker for the present Parliament. Members of that House had been so long acquainted with the name of Mr. Charles Shaw Lefevre as Speaker of that House that it was difficult to proceed to the election of his successor. The noble Lord passed a high eulogium upon Mr. Lefevre, now Viscount Eversley, and then pointed out briefly what were the duties and the indispensable qualifications of a Speaker. These he found in Mr. J. Evelyn Denison, the member for North Nottinghamshire; and he, therefore, proposed him as the future Speaker of that House.

Mr. THORNELY briefly seconded the motion.

There being no other candidate proposed, Mr. Denison's election was declared.

Mr. J. E. DENISON returned thanks to the gentleman who had proposed him, and offered his respectful acknowledgments to the House for the manner in which his name had been received.

The new Speaker was then introduced by Lord Harry Vane and Mr. Thornely, and took his seat in the chair, from which he again thanked the House for the honour conferred on him.

Lord PALMERSTON congratulated the Speaker on his election.

Mr. WALPOLE also congratulated the new Speaker.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE authorities at the War Department have sanctioned the issue of 6d. per diem by the relieving officers of parishes to all those soldiers' wives, married with leave, who have been left behind on the occasion of their husbands embarking with their regiments for special service in China.

THE 2nd Battalion Military Train, under the command of Major Robertson, embarked for Hong Kong on Tuesday last. The battalion consisted of Major Robertson, Captain Clark, Captain Ingledeld, Lieutenant Blake, Ensign Bodkin, Adjutant Thompson, Paymaster James, Surgeon M'Arthur, one quartermaster, and 262 non-commissioned officers and men.

OWING to the large number of men who have recently received their discharge from the Royal Marines, at the Chatham, Portsmouth, Plymouth, and Woolwich divisions, that branch of the service is now much below its prescribed strength: an order has been issued for recruiting parties to be sent out immediately, and the Lords of the Admiralty have reduced the standard for recruits to 5 ft. 6½ in.

A NEW steam screw-corvett, of 22 guns, and of 1470 tons burden, to be called the Orpheus, is ordered to be laid down at Chatham Dockyard, on the slip from which the Racoon, 22, was recently launched. She will be constructed from the designs of Captain Sir Baldwin Walker, K.C.B. A large 91-gun screw-steamer, to be called the Atlas, with engines of 1000-horse power, is also to be laid down at Chatham; with another vessel of equally large dimensions and tonnage.

ALL the disposable vessels of the Mediterranean squadron are on their way to England, the gun-boats having first landed their heavy armament to strengthen the fortifications.

MR. WATKIN, M.P.—We have received from Mr. Watkin the following, in correction of the statement copied from the Yarmouth Free Press, in our Journal of last week:—It seems that the Hon. Mr. Vereker, late Lieut. of Lord Gort, was employed at Euston station, not by the London and North-Western Company. Mr. Watkin, admiring his courage and devotion under reverse of fortune, afterwards exerted himself to obtain a more suitable appointment, but, in the interim, Mr. Vereker obtained a Majority in a militia regiment. Since then he has received an important railway appointment abroad, and Mr. Watkin wishes him every success. Mr. Watkin is not aware in what relation the hon. gentleman stands to Colonel Vereker, the defeated candidate for Yarmouth.

AN IMITATION OF COUNT MONTE CHRISTO.—The Persiero of Oneglia, in Piedmont, relates the following anecdote:—"A few days ago one of the prisoners in our penitentiary died. One of his companions, being particularly desirous of exchanging the confined air of the cell for the purer atmosphere of the fields, resolved to purchase liberty by substituting himself for the deceased. He accordingly secreted the body under the straw, and occupied its place. His stratagem was very near succeeding, for he was carried out of the cell in due form, and had a fair chance of effecting his escape, when he was seized with a violent fit of coughing, at which the men who were carrying him ran away in a fright; but the turnkeys who witnessed the scene were less superstitious, and took him back to prison." The above account resembles exceedingly that narrated in the first volume of "Monte Christo," with the difference of the failure.

SINGAPORE.

At the entrance of the Chinese Sea, and at the southern extremity of the Malacca peninsula, is situated the beautiful island of Singapore. Although thickly wooded and swampy, it is healthy, and the population do not suffer from the diseases which usually rage in tropical climates. In the accompanying Sketch may be noticed the Chinese junks, which are chiefly engaged in the importation of dried and salted provisions from Siam. Meat and vegetables are brought from Malacca. Fruits generally are scarce, and coffee, rice, and cotton do not thrive. The cultivation of the island is carried on by the Chinese. Pepper, gambier, cocoa-nuts, pine-apples, nutmegs, and gambir-bushes, are grown to a large extent by them. Sago and sugar are manufactured in some abundance: the former is made out of the raw sago by a simple and ingenious process, through which about 30 per cent of clear sugar is obtained for exportation. The Tahiti and indigenous canes together produce the sugar. It might be supposed that the temperature would be high and the heat somewhat excessive, from the vegetation of the locality. Such, however, is moderated in a measure by winds from the China Sea. Since September, 1851, Singapore has been united with the Prince of Wales Island: and Malacca, under a separate Presidency, with full powers of administration, which had previously been vested in the Bengal Government. The financial statement always shows a deficit, which funds is called upon to make up. This policy may appear erroneous; but it is more than counterbalanced by the advantages arising out of a system of free-trade. The trade has expanded wonderfully, the island has thriven well, and the commerce has been crowned with prosperity. One reason alone can be assigned for the success of Singapore in this direction, and that is, its unrestricted policy. In this country similar steps have been taken, and loads have been and rates are diminished, a still more rapid increase in trade may be anticipated. It is not a little remarkable that such an enlightened and wise system of government should have been advocated for so extended a period in an island in the Chinese Sea. What influence the present state of affairs in that part of the world may have upon the prosperity and well being of Singapore it is not difficult to foresee. With the enlightenment and growth of civilisation of the Empire of China, which the existing crisis may precede, the trade and commerce of the whole region will, undoubtedly, be augmented. The town of Singapore is on the south-east coast of the island. It is laid out in regular streets, having a population of about 26,000. It is divided into three sections—the Chinese, Malay, and European quarters. It has been remarked that this "small island will in all probability govern, at some future period, the whole of the Malayan peninsula, and in course of time be one of the points from which they are destined to receive the arts and civilisation of Europe."

TOMBS OF THE CHINESE EMPERORS AT NINGPO.

In the neighbourhood of several of the cities in China it has been customary for many centuries to pile up the mortal remains of the inhabitants. Near Ningpo is a necropolis of this description. The coffin used resembles a trunk of a tree, and varies in expense according to the condition of the family. Sometimes the body is not interred, but retained for a protracted period in a portion of the house set apart for the purpose, which is daily scented with spices.* There are several strange and superstitious ceremonies performed, and ideas entertained as to the destiny of the soul after death. The bewailings of the women in the presence of the corpse, and the belief in the transmigration of souls, are a sufficient exemplification. When the coffin is lowered into the grave a tombstone with a rounded head is reared over it, on which is inscribed a simple epitaph. The dynasty is always noted. In the case of the tombs of the Emperors, at Ningpo, in the Engraving, the Ming dynasty was reigning at the time of the decease of the persons there buried; and to that family the illustrious men belonged whose resting-place is portrayed. The Ming (that is Bright) dynasty descended from Hungwu, as Chu Yuenchang was called, on his assumption of power. It endured for 276 years, terminating in 1643. The last Emperor of this race, Hwai-tsung, having lost Pekin, and becoming disliked by his subjects, brought the ancestral line to a close by the murder of his daughter and by suicide. Ningpo-fu (Peaceful Wave City) is well situated for trade and commerce, at the point of confluence of three streams, which, united, become one river, named the Tatsieh. It is next in importance to Hangchau, in Chekiang. The climate is preferable to that of Shanghai, on account of the hills in the vicinity. This city lies in a plain stretching from the base of hills on one side, to the shore of the ocean on the other. In looking around, the attention is arrested by monasteries, temples, and family tombs. Several missionaries have visited the locality from time to time. Trade was attempted here in 1701, but four years afterwards it ceased, in consequence of an affray between the English and the Malays. In 1842 the former took Ningpo, with Amoy, Chinhai, and Tinghai. And a few years have brought with them a renewal of hostilities between the same two nations—between Christianity and Heathenism, between light and darkness, between enlightment and ignorance, between bold intellectual development and the pitiable remnants of still more miserable superstitions. It may be fully anticipated that as inroad after inroad is made into the exclusive territory of China, the strong tide of civilisation will set in with such force that every effort on the part of the people, and on the part of the rulers of the people, will not avail to prevent the beams of the light of its adversary from shining with continually-increasing radiating power into the very heart of the empire.

MR. W. BROWN, M.P., LAYING THE FIRST STONE OF THE LIVERPOOL FREE LIBRARY AND MUSEUM.

NEW FREE LIBRARY AND MUSEUM AT LIVERPOOL.

IN the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for April 18 we recorded the very interesting proceedings at the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the Free Library and Museum to be erected at the sole expense of Mr. W. Brown, M.P. for South Lancashire, at Shaw's-brow, near St. George's-hall and the North-Western Railway terminus. We now engrave the ceremony from a photograph, together with a view of the elevation of the edifice. "The event (says the Liverpool Mercury), being one which must ever form a prominent feature in our local history, excited considerable interest amongst all classes of the inhabitants. Such an institution, while it commemorates the progress of the age, must ever remain an enduring monument of the munificence of one of our merchant princes."

After the presentation of several addresses to Mr. Brown a procession was formed from the Townhall to the site of the intended building, where a substantial gallery had been erected around the cavity of the stone for the accommodation of about 700 persons.

Mr. Alderman Holme (in the absence of the Mayor through indisposition), in presenting to Mr. Brown the trowel, addressed that gentleman upon his munificent gift.

The stone having been lowered, Mr. Brown adjusted it amidst the most hearty cheering; and a photograph of the scene was taken by Mr. Keith, photographic artist, of Castle-street, and Mr. Berry, who had their cameras erected on the ground and took views of various portions of the proceedings.

The articles deposited in the stone were inclosed in a glass vase, hermetically sealed. They consisted of a ticket of the banquet, a copy of the Liverpool Mercury and other papers of the day, the current coins of her Majesty's realm, from a sovereign to a penny piece, the coins of France and Turkey, and a medal to commemorate the alliance with France. The vase, having been deposited in the stone, was covered with a brass plate bearing the following inscription:—

This first stone of a building for the Free Public Library and Museum of the Borough of Liverpool was set on the 16th of April, 1857, by WILLIAM BROWN, Esq., M.P. for South Lancashire, at whose sole cost the building was erected, and by him presented as a free gift to his fellow-townsmen

FRANCIS SHAND, Esq., Mayor.
J. A. PICTON, Chairman of the Library and Museum Committee.
JOHN WEIGHTMAN, Surveyor to the Corporation, Architect.
WILLIAM SHUTTLEWORTH, Town Clerk.

The trowel, which was manufactured by Mr. Mayer, is of oval-bladed form, with a handle composed of wreaths of laurel entwining it, and at the hilt are three circular medallions with alto-relievo busts of Homer, Virgil, and Shakspeare, and the blade of the trowel has a medallion, also in relief, representing Mr. Brown, clothed as a senator, and presenting a model of the new building to the Genius of Liverpool: and rising up between the two figures is the Genius of Fame, who gracefully places on the head of Mr. Brown a wreath of laurels. The background is filled in with a view of the Custom House and shipping; beneath is the following inscription:—

Presented by the Corporation of Liverpool to William Brown, Esq., M.P., on the occasion of his laying the first stone of the new building for the Free Public Library and Museum, erected at his individual cost, as a free gift to his fellow-townsmen. April 16, 1857. F. Shand, Esq., Mayor

Accompanying the trowel was a mason's mallet, made of lignum-vitæ, with an ivory handle, and bearing an inscription similar to the trowel.

Mr. Alderman Holme having read the inscription, the Lord Bishop of Chester offered an impressive prayer.

A number of guns placed on the east side of St. George's-hall announced the laying of the stone by several salvos, under the direction of Captain Campbell and Captain Middleton.

Mr. Brown now ascended the platform and addressed the assembly and was followed by Lord Stanley, Sir John Pakington, Mr. William Ewart, Major-General Sir Harry Smith, Mr. J. C. Ewart, M.P., &c.; and the proceedings terminated by the band playing "God Save the Queen," and three cheers being given for her Majesty and the Royal Princess.

The most imposing stage of the ceremony is described in the Liverpool Mercury to have been the moment at which Alderman Holme, having concluded his speech, handed the trowel to Mr. Brown.—"On the platform, sufficiently elevated to be seen by all, stood the Deputy Mayor; before him the good old man whose liberality had called forth the display—pale, apparently agitated, yet wonderfully calm, all things considered, he received the gift. And then arose the ringing cheers from the vast assembly. All classes of the country were here represented, and right lustily did they cheer at the mention of the name of the munificent merchant. 'Grim-visaged war' was here represented by that valiant and daring warrior, General Sir Harry Smith. By his side stood the heir to the house of Derby, whose enlightened and liberal views give indications of future excellence close by was Sir John Pakington; and next stood one whose name is more familiar than his person to the English people—Nathaniel Hawthorne. On the gallery were hundreds of ladies elegantly dressed, accompanied by gentlemen. Higher still, on the roofs of houses platforms were filled with spectators. On the roofs of houses further off still stood groups of swarthy mechanics, about the strength of whose lungs there could be no doubt. Around the stone and the cavity prepared for it stood magistrates, ministers, town-councillors, select vestrymen, active and renowned electioneering tacticians,—all, all joined in the loud and long "Hurra." Noble Lords and wealthy Commoners waved their hats and mingled their cheers in celebrating an event that will perpetuate Liverpool's fame and England's glory.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1857.

THE real business of the Parliament that assembled on Thursday last will not lag for many days. Mr. Evelyn Denison having been unanimously elected as Speaker, the mere formalities necessary for the legal constitution of the new House will not last long; and on Thursday next the Royal Speech will be read by commission, and the floodgates of talk will be unloosened. But it is to be hoped that talk will not predominate. There is much work before the House; much that it ought to do;—and a great deal that it must do. Among the things which it ought to do, if time, and circumstances be favourable, and if its majority have sufficient energy and wisdom, are several of very high importance, which may be thus enumerated:—First, a Reform in Parliament, to supplement the inefficient and insufficient Reform Act of 1832; second, a codification of the laws of England, and a reform and simplification of the practice of the Equity and the Ecclesiastical Courts; third, the removal of the disabilities still afflicting the Jews; fourth, an extension of Education among the poorer classes of the people; fifth, an amendment of the still grossly-defective state of our Commercial Law—which should include easy, effective, and inexpensive means of bringing to punishment such offenders against the honour and morality of trade as the managers and directors of the Royal British Bank; and, sixth, a whole congeries of useful and well-considered measures, having for their objects the health, amenity, embellishment, and good government of London;—not merely of the ancient city of that name, but of the modern metropolis of Great Britain, with a population nearly as large as that of Scotland, and which is at once the richest and poorest, the cleanest and direst, city in the world. All these measures have long solicited the attention of the country and the Legislature, and have advanced to a maturity more or less complete. They are not likely to be undertaken, much less carried, during one Session; but, if the Ministry and the new Parliament do not show an honest determination to devote all possible attention to the most pressing of them, they will forfeit the confidence of the country. The list of the things which Parliament ought to do might be largely extended, but the six we have selected are the most obvious, and at the same time the most important. Discussions are certain to arise on all of them; and the tone of those discussions, and the part that may be taken in them by the one hundred and seventy gentlemen who have never sat in Parliament before will enable the country to judge whether the present Parliament is better, abler, and honester than the last, or whether it is hopeless to expect any great improvement in this respect under the present system of electing members to that assembly.

But, while these are the questions that may and ought to be debated, there is one question which we have not mentioned, which threatens to take precedence of them all. That question is the war with China. The Viceroy of Canton is still unapproachable and inaccessible—still savage and obstinate. The Emperor of China has made no sign of disavowing his policy; and the animosity of the Chinese towards Europeans in general, and towards the British more particularly, is rapidly increasing, and spreading into territories and districts where Yeh has no authority. In the mean time the British force is merely acting on the defensive. Admiral Seymour is unsupported; the necessary reinforcements are slow in arriving in the Canton river; and will be slower still if such abominable mismanagement as that which prevailed during the war in the Crimea—and which has been repeated in this instance in the case of the notorious steam-tub the Transit, with 800 men on board—is to be continued by the loggerheads, who (in spite of Lord Palmerston, we suppose), are still allowed to be at the head of the administrative departments of the Army and Navy of England. It is no longer a mere dispute with China, but a war. According to every present appearance it will not be either a short or a little war; but a long, a great, and, on the part of the Chinese, a savage and fanatical one. The country must go through with it, and the Government must not only use all possible energy and dispatch, but it must not run the remotest shadow of a risk of sacrificing the lives of brave men and the honour and reputation of the country by the appointment of inefficient commanders merely because they are highly born, and have powerful friends in Parliament, or among those who have influence enough to make members of Parliament for their pocket boroughs or pocket counties. There must be no "Dowbs" to be provided for in this business. There is hard work to be done; and the best men, whether of the Queen's or of the Indian army, are wanted for the purpose. The country requires such gallant and undaunted spirits at the seat of hostilities, as Sir James Brooke. Half an hour of a man like that is worth a whole month or year of some of the martinets who imperilled our fame in the Crimea. The war with China is the one grand and pressing object to which Parliament must immediately devote its energies. Its conduct on that question will settle its character for good or for evil. The reputation of the country is at stake. For forty years it throve upon the glory of Waterloo. That glory was not equalled in the Crimea in consequence of gross mismanagement in London—mismanagement which deprived the nation of the greater part of a most heroic army, and allowed the French army to snatch, if not all, nearly all, the honours of the final victory. Similar mismanagement in China would be productive of worse consequences. The eyes of Asia are upon us, and if we do not effectually humble the insolent pride of the Chinese; if we do not taken immediate possession of Canton and the approaches to Pekin, and then dictate terms of peace to the Emperor as well as to Yeh; if we do not open up that barbarous empire once and for all to proper intercourse with the rest of the world, we shall again lose caste and character in Europe, and—where it is more dangerous to lose them—in Asia. Should the Ministry, in the first place, and Parliament, in the second, act with promptitude and vigour in relation to China, both the Government and the Parliament will lengthen their existence, and inspire the nation with confidence in their future proceedings on matters of domestic and social importance. If they do not, they will begin badly; and, both as a Ministry and a Parliament, their powers of usefulness will be impaired, and neither of them will last. We do not, however, expect such a catastrophe. We have the utmost confidence in Lord Palmerston's energy and wisdom in all questions of war and foreign policy; and there is every probability that both the old and the new blood in Parliament will have the courage and the inclination to support him.

MORMONISM—the existence of which is, perhaps, the most extraordinary fact of the present age—is rapidly approaching the great crisis of its fortunes. How to treat it has long been a difficult problem for the American Government. Slavery itself has scarcely been a knottier point for skill to unravel or the strong arm to cut asunder. From time to time the inevitable conflict between the new religion on the one side—if it be not a misuse of language to apply the word to such a compound of fanaticism and knavery—and the law of the United States on the other, has been postponed, because the Mormons prudently retired from the probable scene of conflict and established their tents in the remote and "howling wilderness" of the Salt Lake, and not because Mormonism was tolerated by the American people. But the day of collision appears as if it were about to break, and this time there will be no means of escape for the Mormons. They have set at defiance not merely the opinion and moral sentiment, but the laws, of a great nation; and there being no Desert beyond the Desert in which they are now squatted to which they can fly en masse—as they did from Nauvoo—they must either yield, or bear the brunt of all the force which the United States' Government will bring against them. To yield, will be to renounce Mormonism—which the Mormon leaders, who are at present all-powerful within their own sphere, are not likely to allow the credulous people to do; while to brave the American Government will be but to court almost certain destruction. In either case, Mormonism as an institution and a fact is in a trying position, and will speedily afford the world a very singular spectacle. The immediate cause of the conflict is the resignation of Mr. Drummond, the Judge appointed by the Central Government of the United States to administer the laws of the territory of Utah, which the Mormons claim as their own. This functionary has found it impossible to enforce his decrees or decisions. The Mormons have a law of their own at variance with the laws of civilisation and Christianity; and, under the presidency of their spiritual and temporal chief, Mr. Brigham Young, who is both their Pope and their Emperor—their Samuel and their Saul—they refuse allegiance to and systematically break the laws of the United States. Mr. Drummond states his case, and leaves it for the decision of the Government of Washington. If the Mormons are obstinate, as may be expected from the fanaticism of the people, and the villany of their so-called spiritual chiefs, a civil war of a nature utterly unprecedented in modern history will be the result. The Mormons number upwards of one hundred thousand souls. They are located in a district remote but not inaccessible, for it is in the highway between New York and the thriving and populous State of California; and the contest will cost the United States much trouble, as well as much blood and treasure. It must not be supposed that this is a question of civil and religious liberty, as too many will represent it to be. To believe in Joe Smith, and to be allowed to have five, ten, fifteen, or fifty wives or concubines, is one thing; but to resist the execution of the laws of a great State is another. It is not for believing in Joe Smith, or for keeping harems after the fashion of Mahometans, that the Mormons will be invaded in their chosen territory, but for treason to the American Union. Their fate will excite no sympathy. A meaner and more beastly superstition than theirs never degraded civilisation. Such a system was only possible in a vast and thinly-peopled country; and in the progress of time, and with the growth of population, was certain to come into violent collision with the common sense, the decent propriety, and the established laws of mankind. The Government of the United States will find, however, that a much larger force will be necessary to bring these people to subjection than the one they have resolved to dispatch. Two thousand five hundred men will be no match for the exasperated Mormons.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

THE WAR IN CHINA.

The news from Hong-Kong by the last mail comes down to March 15th. No occurrence of importance had taken place on the river. The Chinese fired rockets into the Teetotum Fort, at long range, without effect. Rumours were rife of some great movement against the English.

Another catastrophe is reported as having taken place on board of the Queen, a passenger steamer. That vessel left Hong-Kong for Macao at about 10 a.m. on the 13th February. The people on board, besides the captain, the engineer, and two sailors of the vessel, were passengers—two Europeans, some Portuguese and Chinese women, and about ten first-class and twenty second-class Chinese. There was no restriction on the first-class Chinese. When near Macao these men got possession of the chest with arms while the captain and others were at dinner, and the first intimation that anything was wrong was a volley being fired into the cabin. One of the passengers, Mr. O. Cleverly, made a good but ineffectual resistance, and with a revolver wounded several of the Chinese. The captain was wounded, and jumped overboard, as also did the engineer and a European passenger. These have not since been heard of. Mr. Cleverly had his thigh fractured by a ball, but got overboard, and, after being some time in the water, succeeded in reaching a lorcha, and was taken to Macao. The other passengers were taken up the river in the Queen, and most of them have since arrived in Macao. They report the steamer to have been burnt. She had a valuable cargo on board at the time of the capture. The attack was conducted by Mandarin soldiers and pirates, who were on board for the purpose. The Hon. Company's steamer Auckland and a small chartered steamer Eaglet went out to cruise on the 14th February. On the 16th, at Toong-Chung, they fell in with four heavily-armed Mandarin boats. The Auckland could not go into the bay where they were; but the Bogle and the boats from the Auckland went in and destroyed the junks. A battery on the shore, mounting sixteen guns, was captured and the guns spiked. The casualties on our side consisted of one killed and four wounded of the Auckland's men.

The letters received by the Peyo from the China station state that the Mandarins continue to stimulate the evil sentiments of the people by official proclamations and other less justifiable means. On the 6th of March, the Mandarin Governor of Whampoa sentenced three Chinese merchants to death for having carried out commercial relations with the English, contrary to his commands.

Pekin Gazettes come down to the 11th February. They contain reports of some successes of the Imperial troops over the insurgents. There is still no mention made of the state of matters at Canton.

From Shanghai we learn that a band of rebels had burnt Hohow, in a great tea district in the province of Kiangse, and fifteen chops of congou were lost.

Along the coast all was quiet.

THE INSURRECTION AT SARAWAK.

The Straits Times of March 21 supplies a complete narrative of the rising of the Chinese at Sarawak, and of the retribution exacted by Sir James Brooke. Although rumours had been current that the Kungsi people contemplated resisting the authority of the local Government, the latter appear to have treated the matter with indifference. Suddenly, however, a large body, numbering about 200 Chinese, came down the river on and before the 17th February, and at midnight commenced a most determined attack on the Government people and property. They first secured possession of the two forts, one below and the other above the town of Kuchin (the seat of Rajah Brooke's authority), which were only garrisoned by twelve men, and, having furnished themselves with all the arms and ammunition in the forts, they proceeded to the work of destruction upon which they had ventured. This was at midnight, when all were asleep. One party made an attack on the residence of Sir James Brooke, whilst the remainder assailed the houses of Mr. Crookshank (the magistrate) and Mr. Middleton (also a Government official).

A letter from Sir James Brooke, addressed to a personal friend, has appeared in the Times. In the following passage from it he gives a thrilling account of the insurrection:—

BALIDAH, March 15.

I may now relate more circumstantially the events of the last few weeks. Sarawak was as peaceful as it had ever been, and there was no cause to excite dissatisfaction among the Chinese or raise suspicion in our minds of any hostile designs; yet a conspiracy had been formed which had its ramifications in Singapore and in China. A follower of Tien-Te, the rebel chief, had arrived in Sarawak, and some criminals, who had been banished the country, secretly returned from Singapore. I had been unwell for some days, and on the night of the 18th retired early to bed. My servant was sleeping in a room near mine, and Mr. Steel and Nicholets occupied a small bungalow close by. Between twelve and one o'clock I was awakened by yells and shots, and, seizing my sword and revolver, I opened a window and saw that the house was surrounded. The noise told me it was by Chinese. I opened door by door in the hope of finding means for escape, but in vain. I told Penty [his native servant] that our deaths were at hand, and, as the last hope, went down to the bathing-room, which was under repair. The door was not fastened. I opened it gently, and, seeing the way clear, ran across the lawn to the creek on the right hand of the house, and took the water close under the bows of the boat which had brought the murderers to their bloody work. I carried my sword and pistol across with me. Glad was I to touch ground on the far side, though not above thirty yards. I struggled through the deep mud, and lay down exhausted and panting in the road. Recovering breath, I got to the nearest house, and, launching a canoe, pulled up to the Datoo Bandars compong. All was in confusion. I was too exhausted to do much, and Hercules himself could not have restored courage or order to such a panic-stricken crowd. Here Crookshank joined me bleeding from a severe swordcut in the arm. He believed his wife to be dead, and was much apprehended that the massacre would be general. Finding all hope of restoring affairs at the Bandars gone, I pulled to the kampongs above, and persuaded the people to secure their women and valuables in prahus, and to cross to the opposite or left bank of the river, so as to prevent the assailants from attacking them by land. My house, Arthur's, and Middleton's were long before this in flames. We got the women and children across the river, and Arthur, Crookshank, and myself retired to the same side, to the house of Nakodah Bryak. Here Crymble joined us, with the intelligence that after an hour's defence our fort or palisade had been taken, and with it all our guns, small arms, ammunition, &c. It had been defended by Crymble, with four men and two prisoners; three of the defenders were killed, one or two wounded, and Crymble himself had been grazed by a spear in his side. Middleton, Steel, Ruppell, and Penty dropped in one after another. The night fires went out, and the dull morning broke at length, but only disclosing to us the hopeless state of our affairs. We remained at Nakodah Bryak's, doing what we could to animate the natives, and to prepare for such a defence as our means allowed, should we be attacked. I may here relate the fate and misfortunes of our fellow-sufferers. Poor Harry Fenwicke was murdered on the grass, trying to reach my house. Crookshank and his wife escaped by their bath-room door. She ran first, and he protected her retreat with a spear in his hand; but, in passing the stable, one of these villains rushed from the opposite side and cut her down. Her husband jobbed his spear into the miscreant's back; but with a twist of his body he wrenched it out, and, seizing the shaft, he struggled to get the spear. Suddenly, however, letting go with his right hand, in which he held a short sword, he cut Crookshank across the fleshy part of the arm. Both staggered; both let go the spear; and Crookshank, weak with loss of blood, and believing his wife dead, staggered away and reached me. She, young and beautiful, lay for twelve hours weltering in her blood, conscious and calm in this extremity. One fiend hacked at her head till he cut off the long tresses which protected it; another tore her rings from her fingers; a third—for the sake of our common nature let it be told—gave her water to drink. By this time the remainder of the Europeans had been assured of protection; but when the Bishop asked the leader's permission to carry her to his house, he was told that she should be left to perish. At length the boon was granted, and she was relieved and tended, and is now, God be praised, recovering. Middleton's house was attacked at the same time and in the same manner as the others. He escaped with difficulty. His poor little wife had in a bakery till the burning rafters fell about her, and from her concealment, saw the assailants kicking about the head of her eldest child. The mother was paralysed; she wished she said, to rush out, but could not move. The youngest child was murdered, and thrown into the flames, where poor Wellington's remains were likewise consumed, his head being cut off in triumph alone attesting his previous murder. The day broke, as I said, and shortly after I heard that the Chinese had assured the survivors of safety; that they had communicated with the Bishop, and sent for Helms and Ruppell. I then, hopeless of doing good, started for the Siole, a small stream which has its outlet far below the town: it was a wild walk: we swam the stream, washed out every track of our footsteps in the mud, and took refuge in a mangrove swamp as dark came on. By eight o'clock two small boats came to carry us away, and in an hour afterwards I was in Abong Buyon's prahu, manned by forty men, with six smaller boats in company.

Sir James Brooke, having received intelligence of the withdrawal of the Chinese, resolved to return to the Sarawak river; but before he could land the Chinese had a second time come down the river in force. Fortunately the steamer Sir James Brooke, from Singapore, hove in sight. The Rajah and his party proceeded in her to Kuchin, and soon succeeded in driving the invaders out of the town.

The native chiefs having let loose the Dyaks on the Chinese, the latter suffered great slaughter. According to the Straits Times of March 23, at least 1000 Chinese have been killed at the various places, while all the flourishing settlements of the Chinese (except at Kuchin) have been destroyed. The exact number of Chinese who have perished during the retreat it is impossible to say; it must be considerable, out of a population of 4000 to 5000 Chinese belonging to the Kungsi, not more than 2000 escaped the late retribution, including women and children. On inquiry amongst the chieftains who acted against the Chinese, it was found that their loss did not exceed twelve Malays and Dyaks. The Chinese chiefs at Kuchin were completely restored to confidence when the steamer left, and had reopened their shops.

AMERICA.

By the Royal mail steam-ship Arcis, which arrived at Liverpool on Monday, we have intelligence from New York to the 15th ult.; and by the Ariel, the first of the Vanderbilt line of steamers which arrived at Southampton on Thursday morning, we have intelligence from New York to the 16th ult.

The Washington correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer, writing on the 13th ult. says:—

> The army order just issued is of great importance, as disposing of the absurd story that the troops were to be withdrawn from Kansas. There is a total increase of troops there of seven thousand men, consisting of the eight companies of the 10th Infantry, ordered thither from Minnesota. A column of about 1000 men, composed of cavalry and infantry, is ordered under Colonel Sumner, to proceed about the 10th of June against the Indians of the plain. In the early part of June there will be in Kansas, as estimated, between 3000 and 4000 troops, of which 1500 will be detached on special service as soon as the grass on the plains will admit of the movement of the animals.

The Locompte correspondent of the St Louis Democrat states that "the appointment of the Hon. Robert J. Walker as Governor of Kansas, gives great dissatisfaction. It is regarded as favourable to the formation of a Slave State. The instructions to carry out the Census rouses general indignation." The letter also says that a spirit of violence and reckless lawlessness is beginning to be exhibited.

With regard to the China question, we learn by the correspondence of the Herald from Washington that on Saturday, the 11th, the reply prepared by the Secretary of State, General Cass, to the proposition advanced by the British Government was transmitted to the British Minister, Lord Napier—

> The United States' Government declines the entangling policy of a military and political alliance with England and France in Chinese affairs. The reason assigned by General Cass in the premises rests upon the established policy of the country. He concurs in the opinion that no measures within the reach of diplomacy should be left untried to open the gates of China to the commercial and political intercourse of the world; but he declines a copartnership in a Chinese war as a contingent of the French and English policy. Our Government, independently, will use its best efforts with the Government of China, whether of Hien-fung or Tae-ping-wang, to the common ends proposed by the two great European Powers, and the fact that the Cushing Treaty will soon expire by limitation presents the direct occasion on our part for this movement for larger, more universal, and more permanent concessions.

A Committee of the Ohio Legislature has made an extended report upon the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case, accompanied by a bill "to prevent slaveholding and kidnapping" in Ohio. The bill provides severe penalties for persons who shall attempt to hold slaves in the State, to seize or arrest fugitives from service, or to kidnap any person with intent to carry him or send the State for the purpose of enslaving him. The acts of marshals in the execution of legal process are expressly excepted from the operation of law. The composition of the Supreme Court is strongly denounced. Resolutions have also been reported in the Legislature appropriating 100,000 dollars for the protection of Ohio citizens in Kansas.

In Utah the state of affairs is far from satisfactory. It has not yet transpired who is to receive the appointment of Governor of the territory of Utah, but it is said to be the determination of the Administration to put a speedy end to the anarchical despotism which reigns there. A letter from Mr. Drummond, who has resigned the office of Justice of the Supreme Court of Utah to Attorney-General Black had been published in the American papers. The atrocities it reveals, unexampled as they are in our national history, are no blacker than might have been expected from the monster of iniquity who rules over the Mormons at Salt Lake City. The most fanatical clubs of Carbonari, with their oath-bound obligations to assassinate, to promote their ends, fall short of the hideous vows of the Mormon Danites of whom Brigham Young is the acknowledged leader and protector. Mr. Drummond accordingly, "after a careful and mature investigation," of having procured the murder of Capt. Gunnison and his eight associates. He says that his predecessor on the bench, the Hon. Leonidas Shave, met his death "by drinking poisonous liquors, given to him by the leading men of the Mormon Church, in Great Salt Lake City." The late Mr. Babbitt, Secretary of the Territory, was slaughtered. Mr. Drummond avers, "by a band of armed marauders under the particular and special order of Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, and J. M. Grant." Mormon murderers have been pardoned by Young; while "five or six innocent men are now in the Penitentiary at Utah, without having violated any criminal law whatsoever of America." Federal officers who attempt to do their duty in the territory are insulted, harassed, and killed, without being able to accomplish any good, because they are unsupported by a sufficient military force. Since the day the Mormons made themselves a power in the politics of Illinois, no Administration has had the honesty or the courage to oppose them. Mr. Buchanan and his Cabinet, however, are about to attempt a revolution among the Latter Day Saints. It is proposed to send to Utah a military force of twenty-five hundred men, officered by persons of character, who have families; and judges and executive officers of worth and high standing, who have families, are to be appointed in place of Brigham Young and his satellites. Whether such a force will be safe in the midst of a hundred thousand fanatics remains to be seen.

The news from Nicaragua is unfavourable as regards Walker. The story of the victory he had achieved is not confirmed. Colonel Lockridge had abandoned all hope of making his way to Walker by the river. He reached Castillo on the 26th of March, but the Costa Ricans were too strong for him, and he retreated without striking a blow.

SETTLEMENT OF THE NEUFCHATEL QUARREL.

President Fornerod having recommended to the Federal Council the acceptance, pure and simple, of the propositions of the mediating Powers, the Federal Council unanimously decided, on Wednesday last, in favour of the signature of the treaty. The declaration of the Cantonal Government of Neufchatel was to the effect that, although they believed they had reason to be discontented with the propositions on three points, nevertheless they advised its acceptance in order to bring the affair to a settlement at once. There was little of opposition in the Swiss press, except that some journals demanded guarantees for the execution of the Convention. The sum to be paid by the Swiss Confederation is 1,000,000 francs.

DEATH OF H.R.H. THE DUCHESS OF GLOUCESTER.

(From a Supplement to the London Gazette of Tuesday, April 28.)

WHITEHALL, April 30.

This morning, at a quarter after five o'clock, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, aunt to her Most Gracious Majesty, departed this life at Gloucester House, to the great grief of her Majesty and of the Royal family.

GLOUCESTER HOUSE, April 30.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester expired, without suffering, at a quarter after five this morning.

FRANCIS HAWKINS, M.D.
EDWARD H. HILLS.

In accordance with the desire of the late Duchess, the funeral proceedings will be conducted in a comparatively private manner. With the exception of the presence of a detachment of the Life Guards to escort the funeral cortège to the terminus of the Great Western, Paddington, nothing beyond the ordinary display observable at the funeral of a private individual will take place.

Orders were received this morning at Windsor for the opening of the Royal mausoleum in St. George's Chapel. The remains of the illustrious deceased will be placed by the side of her Royal husband.

The bell of the numerous churches in the metropolis tolled during the day, and at the Royal churches the bells rang muffled peals.

The tradesmen at the West-end had their shops partially closed out of respect to the memory of her late Royal Highness, whose private virtues and many charities endeared her to persons in every rank of life.

Her Royal Highness the Princess Mary, Duchess of Gloucester and Edinburgh in the Peerage of Great Britain, and Countess of Connaught in that of Ireland, the fourth daughter of King George III. and Queen Charlotte, was born the 25th April, 1776. She was a lady of great personal attractions, clever, and most amiable. Miss Burney, in her famous Memoirs, speaks of her as "the lovely Princess Mary." The Princess was married, the 22nd July, 1816, to her first cousin, Prince William Frederick, second Duke of Gloucester and Edinburgh, and Earl of Connaught, a Field Marshal in the Army, who died on the 30th November, 1834, without issue, when his titles became extinct. The Duchess of Gloucester was appointed Ranger and Keeper of Richmond New Park, by letters patent, on the 30th October, 1850. The widowed Duchess, though latterly far advanced in years, still enjoyed and saw society, of which she had been a charm during her whole life. She was continually visited by her Royal niece and other illustrious relatives, and she may be said to have died in the very midst of her august and much-beloved kindred. The peerage of Gloucester arose thus:—Prince William Henry, third son of Frederick Prince of Wales, and brother of George III., was born the 25th of November, 1743, and was created by patent, dated 19th Nov., 1764, Duke of Gloucester and Edinburgh in Great Britain, and Earl of Connaught in Ireland. His Royal Highness married in 1766 Maria, Countess Dowager Waldegrave, natural daughter of Sir Edward Walpole, K.B., and granddaughter of Sir Robert Walpole, first Earl of Orford, K.G., by which lady he had issue the Princess Sophia Matilda, who died the 29th November, 1844, the Princess Caroline, who died in infancy; and William Frederick, the late Duke of Gloucester. William Henry, first Duke of Gloucester, was a Knight of the Garter, Field Marshal of the King's Forces, Colonel of the 1st Regiment of Foot Guards, and Chancellor of the University of Dublin. He died on the 25th of August, 1805, and was succeeded by his only son, William Frederick, the second Duke. The Royal consort of the Duchess just deceased, was Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, a Field Marshal in the Army, and Colonel of the 3rd Regiment of Foot Guards. He had the title of Royal Highness (borne of right by the King's sons, daughters, brothers, and uncles) conferred by special warrant upon him in 1816.

Next week we shall Engrave a portrait of the lamented Duchess.

THE COURT.

The Queen and the Royal infant continue perfectly well. On Saturday the Duchess of Kent paid a visit of congratulation to her Majesty, at Buckingham Palace, on the occasion of the birthday of the Princess Royal. On Tuesday and Wednesday the Queen was again visited by her Royal mother; and on Thursday, after information of the demise of the Duchess of Gloucester, her Royal Highness went from Clarence House to the Palace, and remained some time with her Majesty.

The Prince Consort and the junior members of the Royal family have been out daily, generally calling at Gloucester House to inquire after the illustrious and venerable Duchess, whose dissolution has been hourly expected for some days. On Wednesday the Prince Consort and the Prince of Wales went to Westminster Hall to inspect the plans and designs for the new Government offices.

Hic Hon. Lucy Kerr and the Hon. Mary Butteel have succeeded the Hon. Beatrice Byng and the Hon. Emily Catchcart as the Maids of Honour in Waiting to the Queen.

The Prince Lucien Buonaparte and his Excellency the Sardinian Minister were among the fashionable company attending the Royal Italian Opera on Saturday evening.

The Countess Granville will have an assembly on Wednesday, the 6th inst.

Viscountess Palmerston returned to town on Wednesday, from St. Leonard's-on-Sea. Her Ladyship has issued cards for assemblies at Cambridge House on the 2nd (to-day) and 9th inst.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE TOLL REFORM MOVEMENT.

A meeting of gentlemen who are desirous of securing the abolition of toll-gates within a radius of six miles from Charing-cross was held at the Craven Hotel, Strand, on Wednesday afternoon. Mr. Herbert Ingram, M.P., presided; and was supported by Mr. Watkin, M.P.; Mr. Forster, late M.P.; Dr. Charles Mackay, Mr. Mark Lemon, Professor Spooner, Mr. Le Breton, barrister; Mr. J. Cumberland, &c.

The Chairman, in opening the proceedings, expressed his regret that some more influential member of the House of Commons—one of the metropolitan members, for example—had not been called upon to preside. At the same time he assured the meeting that his heart was thoroughly in the work, for no one had a more thorough detestation of toll-bars than himself. Ever since they were nuisances that were constantly presenting themselves, in the morning, at noon, and particularly at night (Hear, hear). He believed that they were effectual bars to progress wherever they existed. It had been urged that, if toll-bars were done away with, people would have to pay for the roads who did not use them, and that in effect the poor would have to pay for what the rich used. He thought that that was a total misconception, for he was sure the abolition of toll-bars would be of very great advantages to the poor. At present they tended very materially to increase the price of food to the poor. It had been stated also that the rich people with carriages would reap the greatest amount of advantage by the abolition of the bars, but people who had carriages did not complain of the money they had to pay, but of the disgusting stoppages they continually met with in going from one place to another. It would be said that persons who were interested were promoting this movement. Of course they were. He (the chairman) was interested, and was most anxious to get rid of toll-bars, and he thought that when such a clear case had been made out against them they should have no hesitation in calling upon the general public for assistance (Hear, hear). It had been alleged that many persons had an interest in the tolls on account of the money they had advanced; but in the northern districts of the metropolis, where the tolls were most oppressive, all the bonds had been paid off, and the argument did not apply (Hear, hear). In such cases there could be no reason why the parishes should maintain their own roads. In the City the parishes maintained their own roads, and he could not understand why the same principle should not apply to the outskirts of the metropolis. That meeting was called for the purpose of considering the propriety of seeking the removal of toll-bars within six miles of Charing-cross, and that he thought was a most reasonable request. The only objection he had to it was that it did not go far enough, for he should like to see turnpikes abolished throughout the length and breadth of the country (Cheers). The people who defended the system chiefly the boroughmongers, who contended that they had a right to receive the full amount of their bonds. How were those bonds originally created? Landlords wanted good roads through their property, and they would have made them at their own cost if there had not been any other means at their command. They borrowed money to make the roads, and put up toll-gates to raise funds for the payment of the interest, and thus enhanced the receipt of the money. He (the Chairman) did not see that they had the same rights as mortgagees on land; but even if they had, they might take an average of the last three years, in order that upon that basis their rights might be secured. He trusted that the present meeting was the beginning of an agitation which would result in the abolition of the toll system throughout the country. In France there were no toll-bars; nor were there any in America, Sweden, Norway, the Isle of Man, or Dublin.

Dr Mackay: Nor in several counties of Scotland.

The Chairman: Nor in many parts of Scotland. In Wales, through the exertions of Rebecca and her daughters, they had been done away with. He hoped that in London they would be as successful as Rebecca and her daughters had, of course, without the same degree of violence (Laughter). There were at present no less than 117 toll-gates within six miles of Charing-cross. In the case of Rebecca they were all poor people who engaged in the riots; and if they had not felt the burden they would not have used the exertions they did. It was high time that legislative interference should take place in England, and that particularly the wretched system of the turnpikes should be abolished in a large metropolis like London (Cheers).

Mr. J. E. Bradfield, secretary of the Toll Reform Association, read a letter from Mr. Fagan, of Cupar, giving an account of the progress which had been made in reference to toll reform in Scotland, and said that in 1826 the same question arose in the metropolis as was now being discussed in that room. These gates were kept up not for the use or benefit of the public, but to enable an old and worn-out commission to expend money and to enjoy the sweets of office (Cheers).

Mr. Hadden, ex-M.P. for Berwick, moved the first resolution, which affirmed that in the opinion of the meeting all gates and toll-bars should be removed from within a six-mile rad us of Charing-cross, and that a committee should be formed for the purpose of carrying out that object.

Mr. Le Breton, barrister, seconded the resolution, which was carried without a dissentient voice.

Mr. Watkin, M.P., moved the next resolution, which provided that the public generally should be appealed to to contribute funds towards the accomplishment of the object in view. He could not help thinking that these toll-gates were a very great libel upon metropolitan civilisation. He thought it was the most odious tax that could be conceived, and he could not understand how Londoners could peaceably submit to the exactions of the tax-gatherers with whose appointments they had nothing to do, whose civility was specially doubtful, who were a public nuisance, and performed no public service (Hear, hear). As far as his services in the House of Commons could be of any avail, he should most heartily cooperate with the hon. member for Boston, who was in the chair, in endeavouring to sweep away the nuisance of which the metropolis had so much reason to complain (Cheers).

Mr J. Cumberland seconded the resolution, which was put to the meeting, and agreed to.

A committee having been appointed in accordance with the first resolution, a subscription was entered into for the purpose of providing funds, when upwards of £350 was subscribed.

APOTHECARIES' HALL.—A microscopical conversazione, given in the fine old hall of this society, on Tuesday evening last, went off with great éclat. The walls were hung round with well executed diagrams and finished drawings of objects displayed under the hundred excellent microscopes placed on the tables beneath them. Doors open for the world's wonder, and visiting cards issued to the fashionable on Wednesday morning the rooms were again thrown open to the great delight of a most fashionable and gay assemblage of ladies.

HEALTH OF LONDON DURING THE WEEK.—In the week that ended on Saturday 1068 deaths were registered in London, a number which differs only in a small degree from those of the two previous weeks. In the ten years 1847-56 the average number of deaths in the weeks corresponding with last week was 1046. But as the deaths of last week occurred in an increased population, the average, to admit of comparison, should be raised in proportion to the increase, in which case it will become 1153. Whatever be the standard, the number now returned is less by 85 than the deaths that would have occurred if the average rate of mortality had prevailed. Last week the births of 904 boys and 858 girls in all 1762 children were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1847-56 the average number was 1583.

REVOLT OF CHINESE COOLIES, AND GREAT SLAUGHTER.

(From the Singapore Straits Times of March 21.)

A boat arrived at Singapore yesterday morning, having on board nine of the crew of the Peruvian ship Carmen, which vessel left Swatow with 290 Chinese coolies for Callao. During the passage down the China Sea, some time at night, the coolies rose en masse, but were driven down below and the hatches closed. The Chinese coolies secured down below set fire to the ship, which was soon a mass of flames. The crew took to the boats. One of the boats arrived yesterday, but the men were so completely exhausted by privation and exposure (having been out nine days without food) that they were unable to work, and were towed into Singapore from Buddoo by a Malay sampan. Off Polo Tingi the boat was attacked by a pirate prahu manned by three men and a boy, who wounded some of the boat's crew with pears and knives. There were fire-arms in the boat, but no ammunition, and the men were too exhausted to fight.

The Friend of China contains the following account of another coolie horror:—

> On Wednesday, 11th inst., the Guhara left Swatow, with coolie passengers for Havannah. She rounded the Cape of Good Hope at 5 p.m., and then placed armed sentries fore and aft. Nothing occurred till At 7 15 a.m. on the following morning the coolies in a body attacked the third mate and sentry in the fore part of the ship. The chief officer was at the time talking to the interpreter, when the Chinese gave one of the most horrible yells possible to be conceived. The captain, officers, and crew immediately rushed out and rescued the third mate and sentry, who were seriously wounded. The coolies fought with fearful desperation, and in some instances were fairly cut to pieces before they were driven below; in fact, they returned the fire for some ten minutes with the muskets, firewood, &c. Finding they could not regain the deck, the coolies broke up their berths and set the ship on fire in the main, mizen, and poop and hatchways, but when the leaders in the incendiarism were shot down they immediately extinguished the fires. The third mate and sentry were the only two of the crew who were seriously wounded. Twenty-seven coolies were killed and wounded—ten killed, three drowned, and fourteen wounded. Some of them say a Mandarin came on board before they sailed in disguise and incited them to take the ship.

The Supreme Council of Denmark has adopted, by thirty-four votes to twenty, the bill relative to the employment of the indemnity for the abolition of the Sound dues.

THE ART-TREASURES EXHIBITION BUILDING, MANCHESTER: END VIEW.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY McLACHLAN.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE aged and venerable Duchess of Gloucester has been called to her rest. Her Royal Highness had for some days subsided into a state which precluded any idea of the event being long deferred, but "Time was not envious of that mild decay," to use a beautiful line of Talfourd's, and the amiable Duchess achieved the utmost that can be implied by the term, "a good old age."

Parliament met on Thursday for the formalities preliminary to a Session; and Mr. Evelyn Denison was unanimously elected Speaker.

The Overland Mail has brought news of a deeply-interesting character. The details of the attack upon Sir James Brooke's settlement, of its temporary success and of the tremendous vengeance which rer ded it, will be read with avidity, and not the less so that they contain, not merely an account of military operations, but a narrative of a sudden and treacherous rising, of cruel murder, and of almost miraculous escape. The Chinese, about whom jesuitism and maudlin philanthropy had combated so successfully as to throw the nation into a political crisis, to the delay of public business and the injury of private trade, have again shown how worthy they are of the distinguished patronage of the peacemongers. Not only did they concert an unprovoked and ungrateful rebellion, but they accompanied it with acts of fiendish cruelty; and, almost while Messrs. Cobden and Gladstone were talking of these civilised and pious people, an English husband was standing over the mangled body of his bride, seeking to protect her, until he was transfixed with a spear; and an English mother was gazing, in the paralysis of agony, while the Chinese were kicking the head of her elder child about the house, and casting the corpse of the younger one into the flames. Happily for humanity, Sir James Brooke is no peacemonger. Effecting his escape, he mustered his forces; and, aided by the good fortune which comes to the aid of brave men, he returned to execute a terrible revenge, which will make his name a fearful one to the Chinese savages for many a year to come. Letting loose their hereditary and relentless enemies (whom he formerly subdued) upon the murderers, and directing these wild avengers how to wage the most deadly conflict, Sir James almost extirpated the Chinese from the region they had defiled with blood. The remainder seem to have been driven into a jungle, whence those who come forth must come as abject suppliants for English mercy. In the operations to be carried on against the same nation in its own capitals we trust that the effect of Sir James Brooke's startling blow will not be weakened by feebler action. There is but one course with the wily and cruel savages with whom England has now to deal.

Our French neighbours have their attention fixed, just now, upon the Grand Duke Constantine, who, with the gallant Todtleben, is making himself acquainted with the military and naval resources of the empire. The sight of the Crimean trophies, which meet him at every turn, he appears to bear with somewhat less philosophy than might be expected; and, if reports be true, he permits his irritation to escape him on occasional sentences of no very great amenity. The French officials, with their habitual politeness, caused some of the objects in question to be covered up; but the curiosity of the Admiral compelled their exhibition. His taunt to the French, that in the Chinese matter they were again going to get the chestnuts out of the fire for England, did not seem to produce much effect upon the auditors. The Grand Duke, notwithstanding his ill opinion of us, would be welcomed in England, as we always welcome a brave stranger, and Woolwich and Portsmouth would be thrown open to his strictest scrutiny. The better that rivals are made acquainted with each other's strength, the less chance there is of such strength being called into action. Had not the Aberdeen and Manchester party deceived Russia, the Pruth would never have been crossed.

The preparation of the cable which is, if fortunate, to unite England and America, is being hastened forward on both sides of the Atlantic, and vessels are in readiness to carry out the line. The Niagara from the United States and the Terrible from England will be the active agents; while our Agamemnon will attend the meeting in the mid-ocean, to render such service as may be needed. The process of making the cable, and that by which it will be sought to place it in position, have been fully explained, both verbally and by delineation in these columns; and the public will watch with intelligent curiosity the progress of the boldest and noblest experiment by which science has endeavoured to annihilate time and space. We trust that the present undertaking will succeed; but, whether it do so or not, the ultimate victory of intellect and mechanical resource is certain. A struggle with nature is less a battle than something like the friendly strife in which a parent seeks to develop the strength and courage of his child who rises with increased spirits and energies from each contest.

A banquet to the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn by his old supporters at Southampton gave that accomplished orator an opportunity of expressing his regret that he had no longer the power of serving his country in Parliament, and must content himself with doing so on the bench of justice. We do not believe that there was the slightest affectation in these expressions. The energetic temperament of the Chief Justice, and the signal success of his Parliamentary career, must unite to make the passionless position which he now occupies temporarily distasteful. Sir A. Cockburn is a man of far too much sterling ability ever to sink into a commonplace Judge: it may take some of the "maturing" to which his colleague, Baron Bramwell, alluded, to render him the perfect judicial machine which some people desire to see on the bench. We confess to have been gratified at the elevation of Sir Alexander, not only because he was a most able lawyer, but because he was more than a lawyer, and one whose fearless utterances seemed to threaten divers conventionalities afflicting to suitors and common sense. From the moment when we heard him, in explaining a law bill, call upon the country gentlemen in the House of Commons to consider it for themselves, adding, "if any man tells you that any proposed law can be understood by lawyers only, rely upon it he is a humbug" (or words to that effect), we looked forward with pleasure to the speaker obtaining a place where he might constantly act up to the spirit of that wholesome declaration.

Mr. Humphrey Brown, late M.P. for Tewkesbury, has come before the Commissioner in Bankruptcy, touching the British Bank, and has received "testimonials" of a character unmistakably different from that of the demonstrations with which it was thought expedient to try to embellish his career a short time ago. "Hisses" from the audience rewarded his admission that he has no intention of keeping his engagement to register his vessels in the port of London, and he "declined to answer" the question whether there was any chance of his meeting his debt to the bank. Mr. Linklater was "happy to say" that he had done with Mr. Brown. The scrupulous conscience that would not permit Mr. Brown to explain matters at an earlier date seems to cling to him still.

The large picture of Rubens, representing "Vulcan and Venus," which was sold at the Fatureau sale for 11,200*l*., was purchased by the Belgian Government for the Museum at Brussels.

MUSIC.

MADEMOISELLE ORTOLANI, the last of the new stars announced by Mr Lumley in the prospectus of his season, has appeared at HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. On Tuesday she performed the part of Elvira in the "Puritani," along with Giuglini, who was the Arturo. She has considerable Continental reputation, and is certainly entitled to hold a high place, though not a pre-eminent one, on the boards of a great opera-house. She has great merits, qualified by great defects. She is, in the first place, young and handsome—an excellent thing in woman—with a light and elegant figure, and a face prepossessing from the intelligence and refinement which it indicates. Her features, however, are too small to be powerful; and the delicate, evanescent shades of feeling which she can so finely render are lost in the expanse of a vast theatre. Thus it happened that her acting was not what is called effective: it lacked the strong colouring thrown by Grisi into the impassioned scenes of the piece. Her voice is thin, and seems almost worn. This cannot be the effect of time: she is too young for that. But we suspect that it has suffered from the necessity to which all singers on the Italian stage must now submit—of screaming the voice-destroying music of Verdi. Her voice was a large compass, and the high notes are powerful, but it is tremulous and incapable of sustaining with firmness a long-drawn note. Hence she has recourse to an inordinate use of the staccato and a profusion of florid ornaments with which she covers and disguises the phrases of plain melody written by the composer, which had much better be left in their natives simplicity. These feats of vocal agility, however, seemed to please the audience, if we may judge by the applause bestowed on them, while passages sung by her more purely and chastely—much better in every respect—passed almost unnoticed. But the approbation of a whole audience is not to be measured by the loudness of the applause proceeding from a section of it. Giuglini with every successive appearance rises higher and higher in the public favour. His Arturo was the finest of his part we have yet witnessed. In person and bearing he looked the noble young cavalier admirably; and his acting was full of spirit, energy, and passion. His song, in most beautifully. Bellini's sweet, flowing, and purely Italian music he sing perfectly suited to show his finest qualities as a vocal artist. His "A te, O cara" was especially charming. In that fine effusion of tenderness he delighted the ear as much as he moved the feelings. It was the high artistic finish of the Rubini school a school of which few ventures are to be found among the tenors of the present day. Belletti was the Riccardo, and the best representative of the character since Tamburini, to whom, indeed, he can scarcely be deemed inferior. Beneventano, who was the Giorgio, sang extremely well, but failed to bring out, as Lablache used to do, the genial features of the tender father and the "fine old English gentleman." This beautiful opera, in its ensemble, was got up with a completeness and richness worthy of Her Majesty's Theatre.

On the same evening, at the LYCEUM, Grisi and Mario appeared together, for the first time this season, as Leonora and Fernando, in "La Favorita." Their joint performance in this opera is one of the greatest achievements of this gifted pair. In their hands the mingled rapture and agony of the closing scene scarcely yields to the great scene in the "Huguenots," where a similar conflict of passions is exhibited with such transcendent beauty by the same performers. They are in full possession of their powers, which certainly at present betray no signs of decay.

THE NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY'S second concert of the season, at the Hanover-square Rooms, on Wednesday evening, was a good and successful performance. It presented no novelty; the Society, on this occasion, having wisely contented themselves with a selection of well-known masterpieces of the great classical composers. These were Beethoven's Symphony in A; Mozart's pianoforte Concerto in C minor, performed by Miss Arabella Goddard; the same composer's Concertante, for violin and tenor, the solo parts played by M. Sainton and Mr. H. Blagrove; and the Overtures to "Coriolanus" and the "Freischütz." Our young pianist played charmingly, as usual, and was applauded to the echo. The vocal pieces were Beethoven's grand scena, "Ah perfido!" sung by Madame Rudersdorff with great vocal power and dramatic expression; Meyerbeer's somewhat hackneyed air, "Va, dit-elle," sung by the same lady; and Handel's air from "Armida" (or Jason), "Che si piange," sung with simplicity and feeling by a Mdlle. Solari, a young vocalist of great merit.

THERE was a concert on Tuesday evening at the Hanover-square Rooms in aid of the funds of St. Mary's Hospital, Cambridge-place, Paddington—a most valuable establishment, of immense use to the crowded population of that district. During the last year it had nearly 4000 in and out patients, and gave relief to above 3000 cases of casualties. Its regular income, arising from annual subscriptions, is far below the amount of its expenditure; and it therefore stands in need of additional support from the public. This concert was got up with this purpose, and was, independently of its object, a very excellent entertainment—many of our greatest vocal and instrumental performers—including Mr. Sims Reeves, Miss Dolby, Mr. Weiss, Mr. Sloper, M. Sainton-Dolby, Stabich, and Mdme. Gassier—having given their assistance. The room was fully and fashionably attended.

MISS CATHERINE HAYES has brought to a close her long and triumphant engagement in Dublin. Her farewell performance at the Theatre Royal took place on Saturday last, and was a scene of genuine Irish enthusiasm. She performed Lucrezia Borgia, one of her best parts. The Lord Lieutenant was present, as he has been during almost every one of her appearances; and the house was densely crowded from the floor to the ceiling. The Irish are proud of their fair and gifted countrywoman, and they may well be so. We understand that Miss Hayes will arrive in London towards the end of this month.

HANDEL STATUE TO BE ERECTED AT HALLE IN 1859.—The Queen and Prince Albert have been graciously pleased to grant their patronage to this undertaking; and Sir George Smart, the President of the Committee in London, has had the honour to receive the very liberal subscriptions of £50 from her Majesty and £25 from his Royal Highness.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE racing on Monday was marked by the reappearance of Bartholomew (who is never likely to ride less than 8st. 12lb. again) in the saddle, and the easy defeat of Melissa for the second time this year, which looks as if she had lost all form during the winter. We seldom remember a more interesting Two Thousand, as Vedette with a whole host of firm Yorkshire believers, Anton with the confidence of owners at his back, and Kent the admiration of a multitude of the touts and Newmarket trainers, were, along with Loyola, who was very strong in the betting at last, immensely fancied. Twelve came to the post in all, and Turbit, after making the running till nearly the bottom of The Bushes Hill, was passed by Anton, followed by Loyola, both of whom died away to Vedette, who made his effort some fifty or sixty yards from the chair, and won cleverly by three-parts of a length. Loyola being beat a head from Anton for second money, and Sydney, a very good-looking compact horse, who showed no temper, and requires a distance, a good length from Loyola. Kent cut up wretchedly, and was so ill-tempered before starting that they were unable to take one of his boots off. He is a most unracing-looking giant, with scarcely a good point about him, and seems to have most effectually defeated nearly the whole of Newmarket. His 3000 h. ft. match with Anton in the spring looks a foregone conclusion; and they are, strange to say, backing the latter for the Derby, though his performance was quite that of a mere miler. Mr. Jackson's £15,000, and Mr. Davis a great amount. The former gentleman has backed Skirmisher heavily for the Derby; and it is quite thought that his own Saunterer will not start. John Osborne was telegraphed for to Middleham on Monday, when it was found that Aldcroft would be claimed for Lord Glasgow, and that Job Marston did not appear to ride Vedette very steadily, and will most probably have the Skirmisher mount in the Derby. There is not a more honest lad breathing, and he well deserves his luck. The fact of four such horses as Fandango, Ignoramus, Vedette, and Skirmisher being in one stable is something quite unparalleled. The winner—who was rather lame when he pulled up—was bred by a farmer in Durham, and was first called West Hartlepool. He is a low, black horse, with beautiful action, and very like his sire (Voltigeur) about the head and neck.

The Ascot Cup has a very magnificent entry of thirty-three, which makes the value of cup and stakes £880. Poodle, Winkfield, Fandange, Fisherman, Melissa, Lance, Pretty Boy, Tasmania, Saunterer, and Skirmisher are all in it: but the American trio hold aloof. By way either of raising the fooling ways of his countrymen or hoodwinking the British, their trainer reserved us of them on Feb. 18th. He has had a suspicious antipathy to Len Lott ever since the latter's stable, which is no worse now, but, being a heavy horse, the chances are against his standing. Prior was also complaining in one foot of thrush, but has long since recovered. Mr. Payne occasionally on a frosty morning has a stringhalt, and will run "no foot high enough to step over a yellow day." We know not what is the hurdling satire in this last expression; but we believe they will appear in the Goodwood Cup, where they have a 14-lb. allowance for being bred in America.

Save and excepting the Handicap Hunt, on Thursday, the Tavistock Steeplechases, on Tuesday and Wednesday, and the Wask North Tyne, on Friday, all the sporting interest of the week centres on Chester. Bel Esperanza (2 lb. extra) is in the Palatine, with Zaiden and Arta (3 lb. allowed), and Commotion, Loyola, Zuyder Zee, Bimk Bonny, Wardermarsh, Tormunent, and Adamas all figure in the Dee. Out of 188 horses 118 are left in for the Cup, on which speculation has been hitherto of the most lifeless kind. Rozerthorpe (7 st. 9 lb.) and Pantomime (7 st. 8 lb.) are well in, and so is One Act (7 st. 5 lb.), the last year's winner, but they do not back her. The Adamas party seem thinking of their horse's Derby chance so good that they do not intend, it is said, to break him here with 9 st. 9 lb.

The sale of the horses and hounds of Mr. Henley Greaves, who will, we hear, be succeeded in the Essex country by Mr. Arkwright, brother to the master of the Oakley, was well attended, on Saturday, by five or six masters of hounds (including Lords Suffield and Macclesfield), nearly a dozen huntsmen, and several of the Essex gentry. Twenty-two horses, many of them up to the enormous weight of three lace-garter, averaged 109 guineas as sold; the premier being Marlborough, 300 guineas, while Mr. Morrell, who is no feather, bought Columpus for 270 guineas. Only five hounds out of the seventy-two couple put up for sale produced no bids, and 1291 guineas—or about 18 guineas a couple—was the amount realised by the remainder. For a single hound, Rachel, 25 guineas was the highest offer, and Charles Payne bore her off to the Pytchley. The two most extensive lots (four couples each) of entered hounds were bought by Lord Suffield for 100 guineas each, and Mr. Garth gave 51 guineas for the best lot of unentered. Among the other hound purchasers were Lord Macclesfield, Mr. Jocelyn, Mr. Baker, Mr. Arkwright, Mr. A. Duncombe, Mr. Villiers, Mr. Lacy, Mr. Lowndes, Mr. Mansfield, Mr. Morrell, and Mr. Stratton; and, including everything, the sale realised about 3520 guineas.

The thirty Cottesmore horses will be sold at Tattersall's on Thursday; and Mr. Borrow's celebrated kennel of twenty-two greyhounds at Aldridge's on Saturday. The latter is one mass of winners, of the old Blue Bugle and Streamer bloods.

Hoar-frost covered the ground at midnight of the 23rd, and at 8h. a.m. of the 25th; on the latter occasion the ground appeared as white as if snow had fallen. Frequent showers of rain have occurred, but they have generally been very slight, and a little hail has occasionally fallen. The wind has been blowing keenly from the northerly and easterly quarters, and has been occasionally rather high.

The sky has been much overcast, but cleared up suddenly on the night of the 25th, and continued clear between 8h. p.m. of the 26th and 8h. a.m. of the 28th.

The correction for diurnal variation are taken from the Tables of Mr. Glaisher. The "Dew-point" and "Relative Humidity" are calculated, from observations of the dry and wet bulb thermometers, by Dr. Apjohn's Formula and Dalton's Tables of the Tension of Vapour. The movement of the wind is given by a self-recording Robinson's Anemometer. The amount stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

DEATH OF MR. MACGREGOR.—John Macgregor, Esq., late M.P. for Glasgow, died on the 23rd ult. at Boulogne. Mr. Macgregor, whose name will be unhappily known of late so familiar to the public in connection with the disasters and ruin of the Royal British Bank, was born at Stornoway, in Ross-shire, in 1787. He was in early life placed in a mercantile house in the Canadas, where he remained several years. He was afterwards High Sheriff of Prince Edward Island, and a member of the Colonial Legislature. During Lord Melbourne's Administration he was employed by Government in commercial missions to Germany, Austria, Paris, and Naples, and was eventually made Secretary to the Board of Trade, which office he resigned to become M.P. for Glasgow in 1841. He continued to represent that city until very lately, when, in consequence of the failure of the British Bank, of which he had been the original Governor, and his own ill health, he vacated his seat. Amongst Mr. Macgregor's literary productions were "The History, Geography, and Resources of British America from the Discovery by Columbus to the year 1847," "Commercial Statistics," and "The History of the British Empire from the Accession of James I."

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

THE amount of money business transacted in National Stocks this week has been very moderate, and the operations for Time have continued limited. The demand for discount accommodation has considerably increased, and the Directors of the Bank of England have declined to make advances upon Stock for longer periods than seven days. This determination has led to very full rates, and in Lombard-street sixty days' paper has not been done under 4½ per cent; whilst four months' bills have been refused, except at 8½ to 6¾ per cent. This stringency in the Money Market may be partly traced to the introduction of the new Russian railway scheme into the Stock Exchange, and the prospect of a further drain in the minimum rate by the Bank of England.

Although the exchanges both from India and China are unfavourable, there has been very little inquiry for silver, owing, we presume, to the large supplies of that metal known to be on passage from Mexico. On Continental account scarcely any gold has been withdrawn from the Bank, but nearly £150,000 in silver has been imported from France and Belgium, in return for a portion of the gold shipped a short time since.

We understand that the Russian Government have removed the prohibition on the export of gold. The last exchanges show a large profit here; but our impression is that the measure—which may be speedily rescinded is a mere ruse to support the gigantic railway scheme.

The parliament of the bill for increasing the capital of the Bank of France have come to hand; and it now transpires that the £4,050,000 of new capital are to be handed over by the Bank to the Government in four equal quarterly instalments, within one year, the former receiving in exchange Three per Cent Rentes, which are to be transferred to it from the National Sinking Fund. The rate of interest to be paid by the State is 4 per cent; and the late advances made to the Government are to be renewed. This measure—which is justly viewed as a loan—has had a depressing influence upon the French Funds, and checks numerous operations in other quarters.

On the Continent money is comparatively scarce and dear. In Paris it is worth 6, and at Hamburg 7, per cent. At Amsterdam the rate is 4, in Belgium 3½, per cent. The latter, however, is not a speculative market.

We have to announce the stoppage of the bank of Messrs. Vallé and Co., of Paris and Havre, but the liabilities of the establishment are not heavy.

Thursday was "pay day" in the Stock Exchange, and rather a large failure was reported. LIFE-BOAT OF THE "TAGUS" TAKING A ROPE TO THE WRECK OF THE "MARTIN LUTHER" EMIGRANT SHIP.

WRECK OF "THE MARTIN LUTHER" EMIGRANT SHIP.

OF the total wreck of this vessel, and the providential rescue of the passengers, some particulars appeared in our Journal of last week. We are now enabled to illustrate the scene, from a Sketch by Lieutenant Cartwright, of the Tagus, who was mainly instrumental in the rescue. The accompanying details are abridged from the Plymouth and Devonport Weekly Journal.—"The Martin Luther was a vessel of 1240 tons register, belonging to Mr. Duncan Gibbs, of Liverpool, and was commanded by Thomas J. Gordon. She left Liverpool for Quebec on Thursday, the 9th of April, at about noon, having on board 498 men, women, and children, as passengers. Her crew numbered forty. The wind was about south, with a light breeze. On Friday afternoon the vessel got a nice breeze from the north, which carried her fairly into the Channel. On Saturday the wind increased to a gale, and the ship rolled heavily in a heavy sea. When in lat. 8 deg. N., long. 49 deg. W. the wind being still northerly, squalls came on, and hail and sleet fell. On Sunday she was under double-reefed topsails and reefed foresail; and at eight o'clock p.m., through the rolling of the ship, she lost her fore and maintopgallant masts. Sail was reduced during the night, and on Monday morning she was under a single close-reefed topsail, when, the weather yardarm of the foresail getting adrift, the boatswain, John Westwood, and seven seamen, were sent aloft to secure the sail. While they were so engaged, they continued and increased rolling of the ship caused her to carry away the main and fore topmast and foreyard, the boatswain and four of the seamen being carried overboard with the wreck. This was at five o'clock on Monday morning, when the ship was drifting so fast to leeward that no assistance could be rendered the poor fellows. They were seen for some minutes battling with the waves, and then all was over. The mainmast had then to be cut away, the mizenmast going at the same time; and, in fact, all her gear had to be cut away to get clear of the wreck. She may be said to have been at this time a dismantled vessel, for the foremast was now alone standing. The vessel continued to drift rapidly to leeward, and efforts were made by the captain and crew to get up jury staysails and foresail to keep the vessel under steerage way, but without avail. The only sail she could set was her fore staysail. Up to this time she lost two life-boats, and a third one was damaged.

"On Tuesday morning the condition of the ship was not at all improved. She was still drifting towards the coast of France, and in eight or ten hours more she must go on shore. The remaining boats on board were totally unfit to render them assistance in case she should go on shore, and the only hope now remaining was that some vessel might pick them up. At about the eleventh hour the Peninsular mail steamer Tagus, Captain Christian, bound for Southampton with the homeward mails, hove in sight. The Martin Luther had been descried by the Tagus on the port bow, and Captain Christian immediately made for her, and lowered the life-boat in charge of Lieut. Cartwright, R.N., of Plymouth, the Admiralty agent on board the Tagus, in charge of the mail-bags, who nobly volunteered to proceed to the rescue of the distressed ship. The sea was running so high that the boat could not go alongside the Martin Luther without endangering the lives of the crew, and life-buoys were thrown from the latter vessel; but, in consequence of the slowness of the ship's progress through the water, the life-buoys got under the dead water of the stern of the ship, and could not be got at. However, after considerable difficulty and danger, some small lines were thrown to the boat, and the vessel was taken in tow, and Captain Christian determined upon making for Plymouth. Mr. Johnson, the third officer of the Tagus, and six men, accompanied Lieutenant Cartwright in the life-boat, and their conduct was exceedingly good. Considerable danger was again experienced in hoisting the boat on board the Tagus after the Martin Luther was taken in tow. The Tagus arrived at Plymouth at about noon on Wednesday, and, after landing her mails, she proceeded to Southampton. The emigrants showed the greatest gratitude towards those who had rescued them; and on the Tagus leaving the port they heartily cheered her, which the crew of the Tagus returned, and dipped her colours.

"On Thursday evening a meeting of the passengers was held at the Brunswick Inn, on the Barbican, when Captain Gordon was presented with a handsome silver cup for his energetic and humane conduct, accompanied by an address, signed by the chairman and secretary of the meeting, on behalf of the other passengers."

Too much credit can scarcely be given to Lieutenant Cartwright, who, by getting a rope on board, and by his skill and conduct, at the hazard of his own life, was the main instrument, under Providence, of saving nearly 500 persons—men, women, and children—from almost inevitable destruction. Lieutenant Cartwright has received the thanks of the Admiralty, and was almost overwhelmed with the blessings and thanks of the rescued crew, among whom some have put up thanks to the Almighty in St. Andrew's Church at Plymouth.

It may be interesting to add that Lieutenant Cartwright (lately First Lieutenant of the Orion) is grandson of the inventor of the power-loom; and is great-nephew to Major Cartwright, the political Reformer, whose statue is placed in Burton-crescent.

REMAINS OF THE MILL AT WOLVERHAMPTON, AFTER THE LATE EXPLOSION.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY DODDS.

FEARFUL BOILER EXPLOSION AT WOLVERHAMPTON.

THIS atal catastrophe took place on the 24th ult., shortly before four o'clock in the afternoon, in Wolverhampton, at a fire-iron manufactory in Walsall-street, by which four persons were instantaneously killed, two others seriously injured, and no less than nine others more or less hurt. The manufactory was situated at the rear of buildings extending to the length of forty or fifty feet, used as a malthouse. The boiler which exploded was fixed against the rear wall of the malthouse premises, which were of three stories, and substantially erected. It was an egg-shaped vertical boiler, used to work a small engine which furnished power not only for the fire-iron manufacture, but also for a grindery and a wood-turning establishment in the rear. At the time of the catastrophe most of the persons engaged in these various processes were on the premises.

So great was the force of the explosion that nearly all that remains of either the malthouse or the fire-iron manufactory, above the level of the earth, is a large chimney, against which the boiler was affixed, and whose massive strength protected a small portion of the malthouse premises from total destruction, and saved the life of a man who had [illegible] The [illegible] and some [illegible] The body of the engineman was carried over a range of buildings in the rear, and fell into an innyard. An arm of another man was picked up near the cattle-market, having been projected over several streets. A large portion of the boiler found a lodgment in the pit in which the malt was steeped. The buildings used for the grindery, and the wood-turning place, were greatly shattered, and the roofs blown off. The shock of the explosion was distinctly felt half a mile off, and produced the utmost consternation in the town.

The calamity, it is stated, was caused by the water in the boiler being allowed to get so low that, the metal becoming red hot, a supply of cold water was poured in, and the explosion took place.

The accompanying Illustration, showing the remains of the workshops, and the site of the steam-engine, is from a photograph by Mr W. H. Dodds, Wolverhampton.

MR. AND MRS. HENRI DRAYTON'S ENTERTAINMENT OF "ILLUSTRATED PROVERBS," REGENT-STREET.

MR. AND MRS. HENRI DRAYTON'S ILLUSTRATED PROVERBS.

Mr. Henri Drayton, the proprietor of the novel and elegant entertainment bearing the above title, was educated at the Conservatoire de Musique et de Declamation de Paris, which he left with distinguished honours in the year 1848, and appeared successfully in the principal lyric theatres of France, Belgium, &c. He first visited England in 1850, and appeared with success at the St. James's Theatre, in conjunction with the French Opera, under the auspices of Mr. J. Mitchell.

Mr. Drayton's first appearance in English opera was at Drury Lane, in 1852, under the management of Mr. Bunn, in "Robert le Diable," "Lucrezia Borgia," "Fidelio," &c. Mr Drayton is essentially a dramatic vocalist, individualising himself with the characters he represents; whether in singing or acting, he becomes Bertram, the Duke, or Rocco.

Mrs. Henri Drayton (formerly Miss Susanna Lowe) commenced her popularity as a prima donna in London, under the distinguished management of Miss Romer, in 1853. Her first appearance in the "Somnambula," as Amina, stamped her as a lady possessing extraordinary histrionic and vocal ability; and this flattering verdict was more than verified by her débuts in the entire repertoire of English Opera and translations for five successive seasons. A pupil of Mr. Drayton, and subsequently of Signor Schira, she has fully sustained her position as prima donna at the St. James's and Theatres Royal Drury Lane and Covent Garden

Mr. Drayton's energy and enterprise have supplied in a great measure the void made by the non-existence of a national lyric stage; and while he, with his pen and the joint co-operation of his clever spesa, have made themselves a home (and, we think, a lucrative one) in their elegant drawing-room at the Regent Gallery, he has done more—he has given us a series of "Drawing-room Operas" (a sketch from one of the most effective of which, "Never Despair," we have engraved), with original libretti and original music of English composers. The songs, airs, duets, &c. are inimitably rendered by them, accompanied by their able pianist, Mr. W G. F. Beale.

NEW STEAM SPORTING YACHT FOR PRINCE HALEM PACHA.

This beautiful miniature Steam Yacht, which has just been completed by Messrs. Westwood, Baillie, Campbell, and Co., of London-yard, Isle of Dogs, left their premises last week for Alexandria. She is intended to convey the Pacha and his suite up the shallow and intricate passages of the river Nile on pleasure and shooting excursions; consequently it is necessary that the draught of water, when loaded should not exceed eighteen inches, at the same time speed being required with a small horse-power. The vessel is constructed very flat in midships, but possesses fine lines in the bow and stern.

She was built from designs by Mr. T. Smith, naval architect, her dimensions being as follow:—Length between the perpendiculars, forty-five feet; beam, five feet six inches; depth, three feet five inches; burden in tons, Nos. 6 68-94; length over all, fifty-one feet; displacement, at eighteen inches, six tons two cwt.; weight of boat, fitted complete, three tons. The engines was made by Mr. Stewart, of the Blackwall Iron Works, Blackwall, and is a five-horse power oscillating condensing engine, with a cylinder of ten and a half inches diameter, and a stroke of fourteen inches. The engine and boiler occupy but little space, having the cylinder and air-pump placed directly under the shaft. The whole weight of engine and paddle-wheels is fifteen cwt; the weight of boiler, with water and coals, thirty-five cwt., making a total weight of fifty cwt; complete length of engine and boiler space, thirteen feet.

into the Order; and all the sons of that Monarch, save only the late Duke of Cambridge, were members, and took great interest in promoting it. At one period there were two Grand Lodges in England—one termed the Modern Masons, presided over by George, Prince of Wales; and the other the Athol Masons, presided over by Edward, Duke of Kent, the father of our present Sovereign. In 1813 was established a reunion of the two bodies, under the Duke of Sussex as Grand Master. His Royal Highness, who is said to have been well versed in the mysteries of the Order, was annually re-elected, and presided over it till his death, in 1843. The Earl of Zetland was chosen to succeed his Royal Highness, and has remained its Grand Master. We believe these are extraordinary exceptions to the rules of the fraternity, as no one can be the Master of a private lodge for more than two years consecutively. Many of our young nobility have, within the last three years, been admitted into the Order, (chiefly, we believe, at Oxford), who take great interest in the institution; and among others the Earls of Carnarvon, Cowper, Durham, and Lincoln; Lords Goderich, Leigh, Methuen, Skelmersdale, Andover, North, Valletort, and several other heirs to peerages. Hence it is expected that ere long the old custom of the three years' duration of the office of Grand Master will be returned to.

The Earl of Zetland has, we believe, given great satisfaction when presiding over this numerous and influential body; but, as he resides a great portion of the year on his estates, Aske Hall, and Upleasham, in Yorkshire, his attendance has not been so regular as the fraternity desire. When we consider that this body enrols among its members very many gentlemen of the learned professions—law, physic, and divinity—it requires no small amount of talent and ability in a chief to give perfect satisfaction; indeed, all allow that it would be difficult to find another to preside and govern so well as the Earl of Zetland. The Earl of Yarborough, who has been for many years the Deputy Grand Master, has, in consequence of long-continued ill health, resigned his office, to the regret of every member of the Order; his kindness, courtesy, and liberality having endeared him to all. Lord Panmure has been appointed to succeed him.

The Engraving is from an excellent full-length portrait, life-size, by Grant, which fills one of the spaces in the Freemasons' Hall. It has just been capitally engraved by Sheaton.

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF ZETLAND, GRAND MASTER OF THE FREEMASONS OF ENGLAND AND WALES.

THE MAY QUEEN AND HER GARLAND, GLATTON, HUNTINGDONSHIRE.

(FROM A DRAWING BY CUTHBERT BEDE.)

NOTWITHSTANDING the fact that the "times are altered" from what they were in Goldsmith's day, and that "trade's unfeeling train" has "usurped the land," and put to flight many of the picturesque old customs that won for our country the name of "Merry England," yet the May-day festival is still observed in some of the nooks and corners of our isle. Its ceremonials vary according to local customs. In Cornwall it is the "dipping-day," when those who do not sport a piece of "May" in their hats or button-holes are squirted upon with syringes, or visited with an impromptu douche bath. In a few—a very few—villages they retain the true May-day merrymaking, so dear to poets and painters, and Dance about the maypole, and in the hazel copse,

Till Charles's Wain comes out above the tall white chimney-tops.

Our Illustration represents May-day as it is observed in the village of Glatton, in Huntingdonshire, and depicts a veritable "Queen o' the May," together with her attendants and "garland." The drawing from which it is made was sketched from the life by Cuthbert Bede, who has given the following description of the Huntingdonshire May-day customs:—

"The garland, which in Norfolk is a hoop wreathed with flowers, is of a pyramidal shape, and in this respect resembles the old 'milkmaid's garland.' It is composed of crown-imperials, tulips, anemones, cowslips, kingcups, daffodils, meadow orchis, wall-flowers, primroses, lilacs, laburnums, and as many roses and bright flowers as the season may have produced. These, with the addition of green boughs, are made into a huge pyramidal nosegay, from the front of which a gaily-dressed doll stares vacantly at her admirers. This doll is intended to represent Flora. From the base of the nosegay hang ribbons, handkerchiefs, pieces of silk, and any other gay-coloured fabric that can be borrowed for the occasion. The garland is carried by the two maids of honour to the May Queen (her Majesty, in respect of a train, being like the old woman out shorter, of the nursery song), who place their hands beneath the nosegay and allow the gay-coloured streamers to fall towards the ground. The 'garland' is thus some six feet in height.

"The sovereignty of 'the Queen o' the May' is not hereditary, but elective; her Majesty being annually chosen by her schoolfellows on the morning of May-day, and dethroned in the evening. Her chief symbol of sovereignty is a parasol of the antiquated umbrella pattern, which she bears with grace and dignity. Moreover, she wears white gloves, and carrieth a bag in which a white pocket-handkerchief is displayed, and in which she will place all pecuniary donations. She has a white veil, too; in front of her dress is her bouquet, and around her bonnet is her crown a coronal of flowers. That Odd Fellow's ribbon and badge (the property of the village shoemaker) which now ornaments the 'garland,' last May-day was hung around her Majesty's neck the substitute for the ribbon of the Garter. You may be quite sure that her Majesty is dressed in her very best finery, and has put on that white frock for the first time since last summer. Observe, too, her white stockings and 'sandall'd shoon'. It is fortunate for her that it is a fine day, and dry under foot, for otherwise she would feel the need for the brogues of her every-day life. Let us hope that she will have as merry a day as had Tennyson's May Queen.

"Preceding the two maids of honour with their garland, and followed by her female attendants, her Majesty makes the tour of her native place, and, at the various houses of the gentle and simple, exhibits the charms of Flora and the garland. If, as is commonly the case, the Regal procession is composed of school children, they sing such songs as may have been taught them. It is then usual for those of her Majesty's subjects who do not wish their loyalty called in question to make a pecuniary present to the May Queen, who forthwith deposits it in her pocket-handkerchief bag of tribute, in order to meet the expenses of the coronation banquet. This feast will take place in the school-room, or in some large-roomed cottage, at the fashionable tea hour of three o'clock in the afternoon, at which time her Majesty, who has been somewhat wearied with the morning's procession, will be graciously pleased to condescend to sit down in the midst of her loving subjects, and will probably quaff tea (at the least) of those cups that cheer but do not inebriate, and will consume plum-cake and bread-and-butter in proportion. If the votive offerings have been large, the tea-table delicacies are increased by the luxurious addition of peppermint-drops, brandy-balls, toffy, and other kinds of 'suck.' When her Majesty and suite have consumed as much of the tea, and cakes, and goodies, as human energies will permit, they pocket the relics of the sweets, and then proceed to disport themselves by 'Throwing at the Garland.'

"A cord has been drawn from chimney to chimney, or from tree to tree, across the village street. From the centre of the cord hangs a hoop of flowers, and in the centre of the hoop is suspended the doll Flora. Balls have been purchased with a portion of the morning's gifts, the boys are permitted to join in the sports, and, in the expressive language of pantomime, 'now the fun begins.' The balls are thrown backwards and forwards over the rope and garland, and, if Flora's nose should be damaged by a bad shot, why, it is no more than Flora might expect for exposing herself in the very heat of the fire. Games are then instituted: 'I spy,' 'Tick,' 'Here we go round the mulberry bush,' 'Thread the needle,' 'What have I appreticed my son to?' 'Blind man's buff,' &c.; in all of which her Majesty lays aside her crown (and bonnet), and cares of state, frolics the maddest, merriest of all. Perchance the village shoemaker (who is always a musician) may permit his household band to be in attendance, when 'the tuneless pipe,' or 'harsh-scraped violin,' will wind up the May-day sports with a dance, and send the Queen o' the May to bed, wearied out indeed, but happier than some Queens whose crowns have been of gold and jewels, and whose dominion has extended to the uttermost ends of the earth."

THE MAY QUEEN AND HER GARLAND, AT GLATTON, HUNTINGDONSHIRE

LAUNCH OF H.M. SCREW STEAM SHIP OF WAR THE "ROYAL SOVEREIGN," 121 GUNS, AT PORTSMOUTH. (SEE NEXT PAGE)

LAUNCH OF THE "ROYAL SOVEREIGN."

THE launch of the Royal Sovereign, 121, screw-ship, which took place at Portsmouth on Saturday last, was one of the most successful and beautiful that have ever taken place. It will be remembered that the last launch at that port of a ship of her class, that of the Marlborough, was not satisfactory. On that occasion her Majesty and the Royal family were present, and after the ship had gone half-way down the slip she hung up, and could by no means be got further till the return of the tide at midnight. A considerable sensation was created by this circumstance, and anxiety was naturally felt as to the result of last Saturday's launch. As is usual on such occasions, the employés had the day after nine o'clock in the morning, as a holiday, and at that hour the public began to take their places. A booth at the head of the slip had been erected, and some hundreds of tickets for the general public had been provided for many thousands of persons on both sides of the slipway. Upon the lofty heights of the middle deck ports of the Queen, 121, and the Prince of Wales, 131, on either side of the Royal Sovereign, galleries had been constructed, and these and every other available spot were crowded by spectators. At about five minutes past eleven the ceremony of naming the ship was performed by Miss Seymour, eldest daughter of the Commander-in-Chief, Vice-Admiral Sir George Seymour, and at ten minutes past eleven, the tide being favourable, owing to a south-west wind, a quarter of an hour sooner than was anticipated, the blocks and dog-shores which held the ship fast were knocked away, and, after receiving some pressure from the rams, she began to move, and glided into the water in the most beautiful manner, the assembled thousands enthusiastically cheering, and the band of the Royal Marines playing "Rule Britannia." On emerging from the shed the Royal standard, the Union-jack, and the Admiralty were hoisted, and the band played the National Anthem. The anchor being dropped, the noble ship rounded to it with the utmost ease.

The only thing that caused any regret whatever was the fact of the vessel going off the stocks a quarter of an hour sooner than was at first intended. Many persons were thus disappointed in seeing the launch, especially some thousands of those who went from London and other places by rail. These persons were found entering the Dockyard as the spectators of the launch were leaving; and a vast concourse of persons met at the gates, and for a time one party could not get out of the yard, nor the other get in. But it was not only strangers to the port who were thus disappointed: the Lieutenant-Governor and his daughter, Miss Breton, drove up just too late to see the launch; and the Commander-in-Chief, Sir George Seymour, who resides in the yard, barely arrived in time; and, indeed, the First Lord of the Admiralty, Sir Charles Wood who had gone down to Ryde on purpose to see the launch, only did so by dint of great activity.

The following are the dimensions of the Royal Sovereign:—Length between perpendiculars, 247 feet; length of keel, 201½ feet; breadth extreme, 60½ feet; breadth for tonnage, 59 feet 2½ in.; depth in hold, 25 feet 4 in. Burden, 3765 tons; power of engines, 900 horses.

Bare figures, however, scarcely convey an adequate idea of the enormous power that slumbers in this colossal ship. The 131 guns which she carries will, at each discharge, inactive 7826 lbs. of shot, or one broadside would pour into its foe more than a ton weight of metal, and at half a mile distance this destructive discharge could be directed with certainty upon a space not more than twenty feet square; at treble the distance, or nearly 3000 yards, every shot would tell upon the hull of a frigate. During the late war these floating batteries sank somewhere in public estimation, not because their power had been proved to be less than was expected, but because they had no opportunity of putting forth their strength. If they stood inactive before Cronstadt or Sebastopol, it was because no one dared to accept their defiant challenge; if Napier or Dundas could not "get in," certainly the Russians could not "get out;" and for this bloodless victory no small share was due to the increased power and weight of metal with which our ships were armed.

As she lies in the water the Royal Sovereign presents a remarkably fine appearance. She is somewhat longer than the Marlborough and the Wellington, both of which lie within a few cables' length of her. The hull has a finer "entrance," and her lines are more pleasing than those of the other ships. The figure-head is a very excellent likeness of the Queen, and displays somewhat more of art than is usually to be found in works of this class. The stern is provided with spacious galleries, and the upper deck will afford one of the finest naval promenades. A walk of eight times round the upper deck will be within a few yards of a mile. Far down below the water-line is the immense hold, where the boiler and furnaces and motive power of the ship will be placed in her bunkers, and her furnace, boilers, and machinery, with water, will be nearly 1000 tons. When all these are on board, with the complement of officers and crew of something like 1000 men, the Royal Sovereign will draw about 26 feet of water.

THE SHIP "SOUTHAMPTON" FITTED FOR THE CONVEYANCE OF HOWE AND CUSHING'S STUD FROM NEW YORK TO LIVERPOOL.

HOWE AND CUSHING'S TROUPE AND STUD.

A NOVEL artistic importation took place at Liverpool a few days since, when the large and commodious ship Southampton arrived, having on board the bulk of the properties belonging to Howe and Cushing's equestrian and gymnastic establishment at New York. The collection is a very attractive assemblage of wonders, natural and artificial—bipeds and quadrupeds, and works of luxury and ornament, and equally striking was the mode in which these items were packed or stowed away for the voyage. First was a corps of thirteen native Indians of the Snake tribe, two women and eleven men, including a chief, a mystery-man, and nine warriors, with their full complement of weapons, implements of the chase, and interesting native costumes. These members of the aboriginal American tribes take part, we understand, in the performances of the Circus, in which they introduce their war dance, council consultations, and music.

Next was the noble stud of horses by which the performances at the Circus are to be mainly carried on. These consist of forty-two cream-coloured horses of fine symmetry; twenty are superb ring-horses, of varied breeds. Among these are individual specimens of rare excellence, including the celebrated horse "Black Eagle."

The stud also includes two finely-trained and sagacious mules; and in addition to all these are several quadruped performers of rare accomplishments. The arrangements for the voyage were as follows:—The vessel, which cleared out on the 21st, did not leave New York till the 25th of March last; and, consequently, was only twenty-four days on the voyage; to provide against which forty days' provisions had been laid in, including twenty tons of compressed hay, 1000 bushels of oats, and 115 casks of water. Each horse was provided with a separate stall, and means were adopted to secure them slight exercise during the voyage; and the result of these preparations was the very small amount of loss sustained during the voyage, four only of all the animals having died during the voyage.

Besides the artistes and animals, this collection embraces also a large number of superb and gorgeous carriages, all of which are used in the various spectacles of the Circus. These include the gorgeously-decorated "Apollonicon," the characteristic "Indian carriage," and several other vehicles of great splendour.

The artistes bring with them their own house. The pavilion in which the performances take place is composed of canvas red, white, and blue—supported on forty-two poles, bearing the flags of all nations, the centre one being of great altitude, and having the national emblematic banner.

The Circus is covered with a rich velvet-pile carpet, and the seats with rich mosaic tapestry—supplied by Messrs. Jeffery, Morrish, and Co., at a cost exceeding £200.

A FRENCH ACCOUNT OF THE CHINESE EXPEDITION.—The Pays contains the following, which must be taken at least with considerable reserve:—"A private letter from London, of the 23rd instant, communicates to us several facts connected with the expedition against China. Recent intelligence had been received from Malta that the health of General Ashburnham had improved. It was hoped he would shortly be able to resume his sea voyage and proceed to his destination. It appears that the number of the expeditionary troops, now about 15,000 strong, is to be raised to 20,000, and that measures are being taken to fill up vacancies and keep the effective force of each regiment to its full complement. Should Chinese not come to terms, it is not thought that the operations of the war can be finished in one campaign. We are assured that the English intend seizing, in the first instance, on the island of Formosa, which is separated from the Chinese continent by the channel or strait of the same name. This island is a dependency of the Fo-kien province, which touches that of Kwang-Tung, of which Canton is the capital. The island of Formosa is 425 kilometres in length, by 160 in breadth. It is rich, fertile, and very healthy. Its chief town is Thai-wan. It has at times a garrison of about 12,000 men. It is a well-selected spot for establishing depôts, magazines, and hospitals of an army, by means of a few military arrangements judiciously corresponding with the advantageous configuration and position of the country. It is easy to form a strong establishment there. The Court of Pekin attaches great importance to the possession of Formosa, which during the second half of the seventeenth century was the scene of a severe contest, and was annexed to the empire in 1683 by a soldier chief of the Emperor Khang-Hi, as the result of the victories obtained by that great Prince."

A NOVEL ENTERTAINMENT.—Madame Ristori, in her last appearance but one on the Vienna stage, astonished her audience by acting in an amusing scene, which, though it frequently occurs in Italy, is seldom if ever witnessed north of the Alps. The little comedy was entitled "Ciò che piace alla prima attrice"—that which is most agreeable to the prima pal actress). In this piece lively and witty conversation was carried on by Madame Ristori from the stage with different friends scattered through the pit; who in their turn conversed with other friends placed in the boxes, who again addressed the actress on the stage. Mdme Ristori talked easily, declaimed from the "Maid of Orleans," told anecdotes of her youth and of her early artistical career; and, after half an hour of the most complete and natural acting, and the brightest and most brilliant conversations, closed the piece by saying that the power of keeping the attention of the public chained so long, this it was "che piace alla prima attrice."

INTRIGUES IN THE PRINCIPALITIES.—The Phanariote Bishops of Bulgaria and Roumelia are the most bitter enemies of the Sclavonic elements, and the following circumstance testifies to their hostile dispositions. The Bishop of this district handed into the Divan a denunciation, in which he described the inhabitants of the town and district as revolutionists; he even asserted that they were meditating an insurrection. The Governor of Adrianople, Ismail Pacha, was ordered to proceed to Philippopol to examine the truth of this statement. On the Governor's arrival the Bishop denied that he had written to the Divan, but was confounded when the Pacha produced his very letter. The inquiry proved that the assertions of the Bishop were calumnies, and the latter then endeavoured to gain over Ismail Pacha to his cause by sending him a present of 20,000 piasters (about £200), and three fair cloaks, valued at 15,000 piasters. Ismail Pacha returned these presents, and departed for Constantinople to report the whole proceedings to the Divan, taking with him two delegates chosen by the district to represent the calumnies to which they have been subject.—Augsburg Gazette

A NEW KIND OF FORAGE.—Prince Schwartzenberg has lately made successful experiments in some of his farms for converting the leaves of the ash-tree into forage for cows. About 50 lb. of the leaves were, in October last, arranged in a tub with alternate layers of salt, and mixed with chopped rye-straw; and even in the cows. This new food appeared so palatable to them that they would select the leaves with the greatest avidity, leaving the straw untouched. The leaves were then given to them without any mixture, and were eaten with the same relish.

MIRAGE.—The curious phenomenon of mirage was lately witnessed at Simand, near Arad, in Hungary, when St. Martin, a village three miles distant, became distinctly visible to the astonished inhabitants of the former place, so distinctly, indeed, that not only the houses, but also the people walking in the streets, could be distinguished. All of colossal size. The inscriptions on the tombstones of the Jewish cemetery were perfectly legible. The apparition lasted about thirty-five minutes, and then faded away. The ignorant multitude interpreted it as a sign of the end of the world, which they confidently expect to take place on the 13th of June.

THE ELM DESTROYER.—This insect, known to naturalists under the name of Scolytes destructor, is a most dangerous enemy to the chief ornament of public walks. It is a small beetle, scarcely two lines in length, and is generated under the bark of the elm, working its way in a direction thus causing the death of the tree by intercepting in every direction thus causing the death of the tree by intercepting in every direction the circulation of the sap. Most of the fine elms of the Champs Elysées are ravaged by this insect, and means are now being resorted to in order to save them from certain destruction, by peeling off the old bark. Dr E Robert, has, by numerous experiments, ascertained that the whole vertical system may be regenerated by this method. The larvæ contained in the bark are thus removed, and the insects in their perfect state destroyed.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY IN KENTUCKY.—A fearful tragedy was enacted near Mount Washington, in Bullit County, on Thursday, April 2, at the residence of Mr. Julius Bukey, an old gentleman, with the first took the life of his daughter Bettie, and then his own. The particulars of this bloody deed, from what we can learn, are these: A young man named John Roby, a neighbour, had been paying his addresses to the daughter, who was partial to him, but the match was strenuously opposed by the father of the girl. He had an intimation or impression that they were about to elope to get married, and on the fatal evening the young lady, who was about seventeen years of age, told her father, who said but the moment before entered the room, that she would pay a visit to a neighbour, and refused to let her leave the house. Angry words ensued, and in the heat of passion the father drew a revolver and shot her twice, both shots taking effect, one through her head and the other in her back. The unfortunate girl fell dead at his feet, in the presence of the horror stricken wife and children. The murderer committed the deed, rushed from the house with the fatal weapon in his hand, pursued by a son, who had been hastily attracted to the scene by the report of the pistol. He tried to use his father's arm to prevent further bloodshed, and to wrench the pistol from him, but he eluded his grasp, and, after retreating a few steps, placed the pistol to his own head, and blew his brains out. Mr Bukey was a man of some property, and much respected by his neighbours, and was over fifty years of age.—Louisville Courier.

AN IN-GRAIN MILLIONAIRE.—A Chicago paper states that one of the grain and produce firms in that city handled within the last year, in their business, 12,500,000 dollars, their cheques on a single bank amounting to 8,000,000 dollars. 5,250,000 bushels of grain passed through their hands.

Memorabilia,

LITERARY, ANTIQUARIAN, SCIENTIFIC, AND ARTISTIC.

"A little chink may let in much light."—OLD PROVERB.

QUERIES.

LETTING IN THE NEW YEAR.—In Lancashire, and the north of England generally, a superstition prevails to the effect that it is extremely unlucky to admit a fair-complexioned person first across your threshold on the morning of the New Year. To guard against this contingency a relative or friend is engaged to demand admittance at about half-past twelve on New Year's Day, who, after an hour's customary compliments and partaking of cake and wine, retires home. Such is the apprehension of some that they interrogate from the first-floor window to avoid the imposture of a blood visitor. As many wealthy and educated families firmly adhere to this practice, on the 31st of December last I inserted a satire upon the custom in one of our daily journals, and received numerous communications in reply. It was also subsequently noticed in a humorous manner by Punch, the writer evidently being unacquainted with the customary. Can any of your readers enlighten me as to its origin, or whether there is a kindred belief in any other part of the country respecting the virtues of a dark complexion?—W. LEIGH SHARPE, Manchester.

HOME-GROWN TOBACCO.—How many acres of land would it take to grow tobacco for home consumption, calculating on the duty paid to the Exchequer? In these days of "cheap glass" might not the same quantity be grown in this country in hothouses, &c.? The average quantity of the weed in England is sixteen ounces per head, but, owing to the adverse verdict of the Lancet (and all reasonable and sensible men must bow to the decision of the medical profession), the consumption for the future will be greatly diminished. I strongly recommend smokers to give me a fair trial; I am free from acro-narcotic qualities, &c.; and I can boast of soothing, tranquilizing properties, innocuous to Englishmen.—THE COMMON LETTUCE.

PORTRAIT OF RICHARD II.—I see mention made in your last Number of a picture of "Richard II.," supposed to be one of the earliest portraits in existence of an English King, and hence possessing great value. Can you tell me whether there are many portraits extant of Henry VI., and where any are to be seen? I lately became possessed of one painted on oak, and should be glad to compare it with others, or to show it to anyone who is able to decide upon its merits. The picture is about twenty inches by fourteen, and seems to be very old, and, though scratched here and there, is in tolerable preservation.—D. W.

ANSWERS.

SHAKSPEAREAN RELICS.—A correspondent in "Memorabilia" asks whether the cup presented to Garrick by the Mayor and Corporation of Stratford-upon-Avon be that which was recently sold in Mr. Berry's sale? I answer certainly not. The latter cup once belonged to Thomas Hill, of peripatetic and Paul Pry memory, and its traditionary fame is that in times past John Kemble, Edmund Malone, and other disciples of "sweet Willy," drew from its concavity copious draughts of choice claret, believing it to be of the true wood, which had been all but worshipped by devoted pilgrims from every land. The "fair goblet" from which Garrick quaffed at the Stratford Jubilee was a far superior and better-authenticated relic than the one in question: being of a very chaste and classical form, delicately carved lined with silver-gilt, with a cover surmounted by a bunch of mulberry leaves and fruit also in silver-gilt. At the the death of Mrs. Garrick it was sold by Mr. Christie, and, after a spirited competition, Mr. Johnson, of Southampton-street, Strand, became its purchaser for £127 1s. On the 3rd of May, 1769, the freedom of Stratford-upon-Avon was presented to Garrick by the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, inclosed in a most beautiful cassolette or casket, made (as they express it) "of that very mulberry-tree planted by Shakspeare's own hand." This casket is elaborately and exquisitely carved with bas-reliefs in front. The carver was T. Davis, "a celebrated artist of Birmingham." The price paid for carving it was £50. To this precious relic are attached the following unique and interesting documents. The freedom of Stratford, engrossed upon vellum, with the corporation seal in red and white wax; the Town Clerk's letter to Garrick (this letter produced at the Jubilee), asking him to present the Corporation with some "statue or picture of their immortal townsman, and of himself, to place in their Hall, just then (Dec. 9, 1768) built;" Francis Wheeler's letter accompanying the casket; Garrick's cuttings from the daily newspapers, relative to the Jubilee, with his autograph notes upon the same; the original bill of the performances during the Jubilee; Garrick's order to his banker to pay Mr. Ayre £84 for his music "to the Ode," with the Doctor's receipt, &c. These, with several curious drawings, prints, theatrical squibs, and playbills, were selected by me many years ago from the long-undisturbed and dusty archives of dainty Davy! To say nothing of the Shakspearean silver medal that he wore at the Jubilee, and a finely-carved octagonal tea-caddy and a cribbage-board, both of the mulberry-tree, the casket and its accompanying curiosities have long been mine. This day (April 23) is the anniversary of Shakspeare's birth, which might well be kept as a day of public thanksgiving to the Great Spirit for having sent such a light into the world the highest and the brightest of human intelligences.—GEORGE DANIEL, Canonbury.

UNLESMOTE.—A question is asked in your Paper, of April 11th, respecting the derivation of the term vinewente, now transformed into woolmote. The signification of both is the same. The old term for wool was wlok. In the Frisian, which the English language so much resembles, it is wlle. In Psalm cxlvii., 5, we have "Se seld snaw swa wes wulle" (who giveth snow like wool). So wag wulles (a way of wool). Unlesmote, probably, therefore, must have signified a woolmart or wool-meeting, the spelling having undergone gradual transformation.—H.

WHAT DOES THE DAY BEGIN?—Many years ago I remember reading a most clear and able explanation of this question in Captain Basil Hall's "Fragments of Voyages and Travels." I am unable to refer to the book at present; but, if my memory serves me, your correspondents will find an answer to their questions in one of the volumes of the series of that work. S. L. B.'s conjecture is right. The antipodes, or rather the 180th parallel of longitude, is chosen on board all British ships as the line in crossing which the name of the day is altered in the log. Whether the same line is adopted in foreign vessels I am not aware. The early circumnavigators, who sailed from E to W., on arriving at the Philippine Islands, which had been colonised from Europe by way of the Cape of Good Hope, found themselves exactly in the case which "A Mathematical Tutor" supposes. There was exactly twenty-four hours between the two calculations.—S. R. G., Bath.

VULGAR ERRORS.—With respect to the old newspaper cutting (reprinted in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of April 18), at least one of the "errors" had some foundation. In Hastings, in 1650, eight-pence was paid for two hedgehogs. The reward for a fox was one shilling. I am indebted for my information to the Hastings News.—J. G.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

THE personal constitution of the new Parliament has been very naturally the subject of much consideration and a great deal of conjecture. There has been a somewhat exaggerated view taken of the changes in the representation, as involving an infusion of untried men, and which in some quarters has created alarm. Very desolating pictures have been drawn of an undisciplined mob of unpractised legislators, under the unpractised guidance of a new Speaker, resolving the House of Commons into something no better than is presented to the world by a local legislature in a recent annexation of the United States. Now, in the first place, the number of members returned to the coming Parliament who had no seats in the last is one hundred and ninety, and of these between thirty and forty have formerly been in Parliament, and some of them are really what may be called old hands. In the next place, a large proportion of the new members are men of mature years, of business habits and experience in various callings in life, and can have little to learn in the way of order, regularity, and diligence; while the young and inexperienced are at least gentlemen, who, either by themselves or their friends, have been entered in the lists of the House of Commons as the best training-school for a man who means to do his work in the world. In all but a very few instances the choice of such a career indicates a consciousness of the possession of the intellect and the purpose for its requirements. It has been a fashion to say that it takes at least two Sessions to acquire a member to the moral atmosphere of the House; but in examining the moral atmosphere of the House; but in examining down that axiom too little weight is given to the influence of the genius of the place. It is, besides, reversing the order of things to suppose that some hundred and twenty or thirty neophytes could leaven the old mass instead of being speedily absorbed in it; even admitting that the merchants, barristers, railway directors, and men who have been directing the business of their own localities, who constitute the majority of recently-elected members, are a set of impracticable greenhorns. Let it be given that the new members possess, individually, the ordinary qualifications; that they have tolerably strong and enduring "physiques" (a property by no means to be overlooked); that they are moderately gifted with brains, and not wholly divested of worldly tact; and if they will, for a very short time, study and conciliate the requirements of a busy assembly bent, not upon theorising or oratorising, but solely on practical government, there is no reason to doubt but that in a month the most experienced observer of Parliament will find it difficult to detect any deficiencies or to note any material difference betweenthe old House and the new—except in the matter of faces and voices.

In estimating probabilities with regard to the more or less rapidity with which new membership may be adapted into shape, it should be noted that the elections, however they have resulted in changes of men, have wrought no difference in the class from which members have been selected. There are but three tradesmen proper—that is men who start from their shops to go to the House—among them, and one of them has had a seat in Parliament before; while it need hardly be said of the working class, strictly so called, there has not been the slightest infusion. The material to work upon is therefore the same as ever; and if in past times a short apprenticeship has been found sufficient, after every general election, to bring the House up, we will not say to the mark, but to a certain standard of efficiency, there is little fear of our being now troubled with a plague of Parliamentary mediocrity.

A word or two on the new members or at least on some of the more prominent among them, may not just now be out of place. Of the aristocracy proper, that is scions of the Peerage, there are about twenty among the new members. First on the list is Lord Aldhorp, who has succeeded in ousting a Conservative from the representation of South Northamptonshire. A host of associations naturally arise at the mention of that name, which was once the rallying-point of a great party in the State when borne by a man who, without genius, without even any striking ability, and who could not speak two consecutive words without stammering, by the mere force of high character and good sense led the House of Commons during one of the greatest political struggles which have occurred since the Revolution. The present Lord Althorp is the son and nephew of Lord Grey's Chancellor of the Exchequer, being a son of the present Earl Spencer, Lord Steward of the Household. He is yet very young, having been born in 1832. He enters Parliament with all the prestige that can attach to a name, and his career will probably be watched. The new member for Hull has also a hereditary name to sustain, for people will be apt to expect something from a Lord Ashley. Running down the list, there is little to be said of the other Lords and Honourables on whom the eye falls in succession, except that the Hon. Captain Annesley has been in the Crimea; and so has Lord Dunkellin, where he was taken prisoner; besides which he is now with the Persian expedition; has been up in a balloon from Vauxhall; and will be Marquis of Clanricarde in due time. The return of Lord Ingestre for Stafford is noteworthy, inasmuch as this young nobleman, while a subaltern in the Life Guards, acquired a reputation as a student of political and social questions which bid fair to fit him for a careful and energetic public life. Merely naming the Earl of Lincoln and Lord Worsley as the sons of well-known public men, we may pass over the Bathursts, and Burys, and Cavendishes, and Denisons, and Hays, and Curzons, whose sounding names do luckily the roll of new members, and come to the next class in dignity. The Baronets figure in the new list to the number of seventeen or eighteen. Three of them namely, Sir Edward Burton, Sir Edward Colebrooke, and Sir Harry Verney—have sat in previous Parliaments. Of the rest, the only one whom it is necessary to distinguish is Sir Arthur Elton, member for Bath. This gentleman has for some little time been an active member of that out-of-door congress of politicians which is always more or less in operation in this country; and has signalised himself as an advanced Liberal, of great breadth of view and as a thoughtful exponent of certain politico-economic and social questions. The order of Knighthood is but poorly represented. Sir John Potter (famous for supplanting Mr Bright at Manchester and Sir Frederic Smith, an eminent military engineer, who sat for a short time in the last Parliament for Chatham, but was unseated on petition) comprising the list. In the table of precedence the learned professions are entitled to the next pas; and so it may be stated that there are eight or ten barristers recruited to the legal ranks of the House; but, as no less than eleven of that profession were ousted from their seats at the election, they can hardly be called an addition. First in rank and standing in the profession is Mr Bolt, ex-Attorney-General; Mr. Bovill, and Mr. K. Macaulay, are names of eminence in Westminster Hall; while Mr. A. W. Kinglake has a world-wide literary fame as the author of "Eothen." There are two Aldermen of the Corporation of London among the newly-elected members; namely, Alderman Copeland, a Parliamentary representative of many years' standing, who has regained his seat for Stoke-upon-Trent, and Sir Robert Carden, who has had the honour to defeat a member of the Government at Gloucester. There are some twenty officers of the Army who are now for the first time representatives of the people. The only really noticeable personages among them are General Windham, popularly called the "hero of the Redan," and General Thompson, the veteran Reformer, whose laurels have been for many years won in the field of politics rather than in those of warfare. The number of naval officers is small, and when and has mentioned Lord Clarence Paget, who rather distinguished himself before Sebastopol, the chronicle of more or less notabilities is exhausted.

In the last Parliament there were two Quakers, Mr. Bright and Mr. James Bell. Those gentlemen are among the rejected, but the sect is still represented by Mr. Charles Gilpin and Mr. Henry Pease. The traditional obstinacy of Quakerism has in many respects been compelled to yield to the conventionalities of the House of Commons. Mr. Bright is understood to have gladly availed himself of the opportunity afforded by his membership to drop the "thee" and the "thou" of his persuasion; and if he still adhered to the "coat" it was in a modified form, and in no other respect could one have traced in him any mark of the peculiarities of the Society of Friends. Long admixture with political life out of Parliament has worked similar effects on Mr. Charles Gilpin; and, certainly, any one who saw him appear on the hustings at Northampton, would not have recognised, either in his costume or his phraseology, the slightest approach to Quakerism. Mr. Pease has a family right to mention, inasmuch as his brother was the first Quaker who sat in Parliament. He was one of the famous Peace Embassy to St. Petersburg in 1854.

A general review of the list of new members, apart from the above classification, does not afford much scope for remark. There is to be sure Mr. Caird, now member for Dartmouth, whose fame as an agriculturist and statistician has long been unquestioned. Mr. Cuninghame, who has gained a seat for Brighton, acquired some notoriety for having contested Westminster at the general election of 1852; but he has been still more signalised for his attacks on the system pursued in the conduct of the National Gallery of Pictures. Mr. Hanbury, as the successful candidate in a contest for Middlesex, may be entitled to mention on that account; but he has also acquired some notice from the fact that he is the third of an eminent firm of brewers whom constituencies have sent to the new Parliament, which has been thus generously supplied with Hanbury, Buxton, and Co.'s entire. Although not, strictly speaking, a new member, as he has sat in former Parliaments, Mr. Alexander Beresford Hope is a recruit of the election of 1857; and, for want of better, he may be placed among the number of notabilities, inasmuch as he is a shining light of Puseyism, and has proved his devotion to opinions by setting aside a large sum from his annual income for the building and endowment of a church in which the principles of his sect are carried out in their fullest integrity. Mr. Torrens M'Cullagh, who has been, after several attempts, at length returned for Yarmouth, is not a Parliamentary novice; for as member for Youghal, some years ago, he strove hard to make himself a prominent personage in the House. During his enforced secession from Parliament it is understood that he has applied himself to amateur journalism with remarkable success. Among the new members who are old Parliamentarians may be mentioned Mr. Stanley, Mr. J. P. Somers, and Sir J. S. Trelawney. Each of these was distinguished in his way. Mr. Stanley was well known as an earnest and philanthropic advocate for the amelioration of the condition of the working classes; Sir J. S. Trelawney was an advanced philosophic Radical; while Mr. J. P. Somers was a striking and unimpeachable specimen of a class of Irish members, now nearly, if not altogether, extinct, under the combined influence of Father Mathew and the Encumbered Estates Court.

It will be seen that, considered as a whole, the new men, who have replaced some great, some most able, and many useful and efficient members of the last Parliament, are not of those who have been accustomed to fill the public eye, or of whom it can be confidently predicted that they will evolve high qualities as statesmen or legislators. Nevertheless, there at least is hope left with regard to those who are not known; and, however defective in many respects the constituencies of this country may be in the discharge of their duties, they are yet not altogether unworthy of so much faith as would induce us to believe that in substituting for nearly two hundred of their representatives other men they will not at least have supplied the Legislature on the average with an equal amount of good sense, good intention, and good character as that which they have withdrawn from it.

But, for good or for evil, in a few days the new Parliament will assemble for the dispatch of business. The early proceedings on such an occasion are uniform and simple. On the day appointed the House of Commons assembles, in a confused and uncertain manner, indicative of their being like sheep without a shepherd, and anxiously await a summons to the Upper House. There the Lord Chancellor, and other Peers are appointed a Royal Commission; and in a short address they signify the pleasure of her Majesty that the Lords spiritual and temporal and her faithful Commons should forthwith proceed to the business of the nation, and to this end they desire that the representatives of the people should retire to their own House and choose a Speaker, without whom no regular communication can take place between the Throne, or the Upper House, and the House of Commons.

Long before this it has been known who is to be the choice of the House, and the gentleman in question usually takes his place in the first seat on the front bench below the gangway, doing his utmost to look serene and unconscious of his coming honours. The Clerk of the House presides on this occasion, and it is to him that the mover and seconder of the nomination of the Speaker address themselves. Supposing that there is no contest for the office—which it is anticipated will be the case on the present occasion the speaking is in the first instance confined to the mover and seconder, and as soon as the vote of the House is taken they place themselves on each side of the chair of the Speaker, walk him up to the chair, and place him finally into the chair. The leader on the Ministerial side then makes a laudatory speech on behalf of the new chief officer of the House, and if the selection is unanimous the leader of the Opposition is equally gracious. The Speaker then returns thanks, and for that day the proceedings terminate. On the following day the Speaker appears in a Court costume, but without robes, and in a short wig; and in this guise he heads a procession of the House to the bar of the Chamber of Peers, where the Royal Commissioners are informed by him of the choice which the House has made of a Speaker, and he claims on their behalf all their ancient rights and privileges, especially including freedom of speech and exemption from arrest. The Lord Chancellor, in courteous terms, confirms, on the part of the Crown, the choice of the Commons, and again both Houses adjourn. For the next four or five days the Speaker sits from two to four o'clock to swear in the members. This is a tedious and dispiriting operation. The House is dull and quiet to a degree the stillness only interrupted occasionally by a call from the Speaker of "Members to be sworn, please to come to the table," when a sufficiently large batch has been got together to make the ceremony as imposing as possible, which is not much after all. At length, when all the members who have not signified their inability to attend have been sworn, there comes a day when, shortly before two o'clock, the Speaker, having for the first time assumed his full dress of state robes, is summoned to conduct the Commons once more to the Upper House, where the Speech from the Throne is delivered in the usual manner; the business of the Session then actually begins, and, all the extraordinary observances of a new Parliament having terminated, its individuality is lost, and the reign of routine once more begins.

SIR JOSHUA ROWE.—The Jamaica Legislative Council has unanimously passed a series of resolutions in record of its appreciation of the character and abilities of Sir Joshua Rowe, K.C.B., late Chief Justice and Vice-Chancellor of the island, who has returned to England after nearly a quarter of a century's service in the colony. A portion of this time comprised a season of remarkable excitement and administrative difficulty; for Sir J. Rowe took office immediately after the abolition, and presided during the transition periods when negro slavery became apprenticeship, and when the latter was succeeded by emancipation. The retiring Chief Justice has won golden opinions from the colonists, and his departure has been attended by their regrets.

THE RUSSIAN RAILWAY SCHEME.—The public allotment of the shares of the Russian Railways, states the Nord, was fixed to take place at St. Petersburg and other capitals on the 24th ult. The systematic and unjustified hostility of speculators and newspapers to the Russian Railway scheme (continues the Brussels organ of St. Petersburg) has hitherto had no other effect than to show more clearly than ever the evidence and the advantages the shareholders, as well as Europe and Russia, will derive from that vast enterprise. The shares are everywhere so much in demand that it is to be expected that the applications for them will be far from being satisfied. Even in Austria, in spite of the tactics of the Austrian press, public opinion is favourable to the undertaking. The journals of Prague, and a letter from Vienna, in the Cologne Gazette state that large sums have been subscribed in all the Austrian Empire, and particularly at Vienna. The Ostdeutsche Post, which attacks the enterprise with some bitterness, and menaces the shareholders with the miasma of the Putrid Sea, forgets that Russia is not Austria. If Russia, with the immense fertility of her soil, is even now, when the benefits of capital and the spirit of enterprise are unknown to her, the most productive country of Europe, what will she be when capital and enterprise shall have accomplished for her the miracles they have effected elsewhere?

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—MEMBERS AND ASSOCIATES.

IN presenting our readers with a series of portraits and biographical notices of Members and Associates of the Royal Academy just before the opening of the Annual Exhibition, we are anxious to state that we do not consider the present list in any way complete, or even the selection fully representative of the body from which our portraits are taken. Our readers will perhaps, therefore, understand that we give the present selection en attendant, hoping that later we shall be able to give another series. We are happy in having a large proportion of the class of Associates, inasmuch as, being the "rising men," greater curiosity is felt respecting them precisely as they are less known.

JOHN GIBSON, R.A.

This strictly classical, yet original, sculptor was born in 1790. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed to a cabinetmaker in Liverpool, and, like Chantrey, worked at that trade till, of his own entreaty, he was allowed to become a wood-carver. A visit to the works of Messrs. Francis, statuaries, elevated his ambition to be a sculptor; and the excellence of a model in wax which he executed when in his eighteenth year induced this firm to purchase his indentures and employ him themselves. He was now fortunate in obtaining the friendly interest of Roscoe, and at the expiration of his apprenticeship a subscription was raised sufficiently large to send him to Rome and support him there two years. In Rome he placed himself under Canova, and subsequently under Thorwaldsen, and the influence of both is apparent in his works. The great attractions and facilities in Rome for the study of plastic art have proved sufficient to retain him there almost throughout his professional career. Commencing with the patronage of the Duke of Devonshire, and not long after that of Louis, King of Bavaria, he has enjoyed a rapid succession of commissions for ideal subjects. The Royal Academy elected him A.R.A. in 1833, and R.A. in 1836. We have no space to enumerate his poetical productions, but the following may be mentioned as among the more remarkable: "Mars and Venus," "Cupid Disguised as a Shepherd Boy," "Hebe," "Sleeping Shepherd," "Sappho," "Proserpine," and "Aurora." The monumental statue of the Queen, with allegorical figures, and the Parliamentary statue of Sir Robert Peel have been recently erected—the first in the Prince's Chamber, in the new Houses of Parliament; and the second in Westminster Abbey. In his latest works Mr. Gibson has, following the precedent afforded by classic art—not to mention the thick coats of paint of Mediæval art—introduced a slight tinge of colour, but the practice is not adopted by his brother sculptors, and as a question of esthetics is open to many objections.

PATRICK MACDOWELL, R.A.

We take the few following facts in the life of this highly poetical sculptor from a very interesting autobiography which appeared in the Art Journal for 1850. Mr. Macdowell was born at Belfast in 1799. Losses sustained in business caused his father's death prematurely, and his wife and only child were left in a great measure unprovided for. As early as eight years of age the schoolmaster of the boy-artist discovered him drawing on his slate; but fortunately this gentleman was also an engraver, and instead of chastisement gave him encouragement. When twelve years of age his mother brought him to England, and after two more years' schooling he was apprenticed to a coachbuilder, from whom he was released at the end of four years by the bankruptcy of his master. Mr. Macdowell now happened to take a room in the house of a French sculptor named Cheuu, from whom he learnt the rudiments of his art so successfully that he soon ventured upon taking a small studio of his own. He now competed successfully for a commission for a monument to Major Cartwright, but the funds proved inadequate for its execution. He was, however, intrusted with work in marble shortly afterwards; and this, the "Girl Reading," and some large works executed for Mr. W. Beaumont, greatly enhanced his reputation, and secured him the rank of A.R.A. The generosity of Mr. Beaumont enabled him to visit Italy. At the end of eight months he returned, and completed his "Love Triumphant." To this succeeded "A Girl at Prayer," "Cupid," "Early Sorrow," "Psyche," "The Death of Virginia," and "Eve." The merit of these rendered them very prominent among the sculpture in the Great Exhibition of 1851, where they were all exhibited. In 1846 he was elected R.A. The genius of Mr. Macdowell, like that of Mr. Bailey, has certainly not met with due recognition, through the mismanagement which has denied nearly all the commissions and competitions for our public works.

SIR WILLIAM CHARLES ROSS, R.A.

This courtly and exquisite miniature-painter was born in London, in 1794. The fact that his father was a miniature-painter and his mother an artist was favourable to the early development of his genius, and we consequently find him, displaying remarkable precocity, at the age of nine years, entered the Royal Academy as a student and gained in successive years various prizes from the Society of Arts and ultimately the gold medal of the Academy. Hilton being one of the unsuccessful competitors. For some time he worked in water-colours and subsequently in oil on a large scale, and to this may be attributed the unusually excellent cast the drawing of his miniatures. For as Hilton said: "When a man who draws in large forms is put into little, he compresses his knowledge, but a man who draws on little, when he paints on large, only enlarges his ign rance." Sir W. Ross, with a fondness of both unknown to the older masters, has worthily supported a branch of the arts in which we distinguished ourselves long before we could say anything of most of the others; and which the Japanese and Chinese could not at any other; but which the Egyptians and Assyrians were still pre-eminent. Sir W. Ross's portraits are most truthful in resemblance refined in feeling and expression and very broad and transparent in colour. The miniatures of Thurburn have more power and depth, but there is a question whether the qualities do not more legitimately belong to painting in oil. The career of Sir W. Ross has been as prosperous as that of Lawrence and he has painted a great portion of the Royal and aristocratic personages of this and other country. He was elected Associate in 1838, Academician in 1842, and was Knighted the same year.

DAVID ROBERTS, R.A.

This cosmopolitan painter was born in Edinburgh, in 1796. He served his time along with Mr. D. R. Hay (the writer on theories of design and colour), to a house-painter. His first instruction in art he derived from the Trustees' Academy. In 1822 Mr. Roberts came to London, and we find him along with Mr. Stanfield painting scenes at Drury-lane Theatre. Subsequently, like Stanfield, he was for several years a member, and part of the time Vice-President, of the Society of British Artists. In 1839,he was elected by the Academy A.R.A., and in 1841, to the full honours. Besides an extensive series of views in Scotland, he has visited Spain and large and noble oil-pictures from an immense number of sketches taken in France, Spain, and the Netherlands, in which the architecture, especially of the several countries, is most successfully treated. In proof of which, these works have been re-engraved in those countries, and are the only views of the kind known. The work which has, however, given him more than European reputation, is his "Sketches in the Holy Land, Egypt, &c.," lithographed by Louis Haghe, described by Dr. Croly, and published by Virtue, Hume, and Virtue. It occupied the artist and engraver eight years, and is probably the largest work of the kind, produced by private enterprise, ever published. The magnificent "Interior of St. Peter's" at Rome, exhibited last year, was only one of a long series of equally imposing works.

EDWARD MATTHEW WARD, R.A.

By his original choice of subjects, in which the social life of the past is represented more often than the political, this popular painter has enlarged the boundaries of historical painting. Born in 1816; at eighteen he was admitted student of the Royal Academy, and two years after was successful, and it was only in this year that the favourable notice taken of his "Dr. Johnson reading the MS. of the Vicar of Wakefield," confirmed him in his present style. "Dr. Johnson in the ante-room of Lord Chesterfield," painted in 1845, at once gave Mr. Ward the reputation he has since so ably supported by such works as the following:—"The Fall of Clarendon," "The South-Sea Bubble," "Highgate Fields During the Great Fire," "James II. Receiving Tidings of the Landing of the Prince of Orange," "The Royal Family of France in the Prison of the Temple," "Charlotte Corday Led to Execution; and the "The Last Parting of Marie Antoinette and her Son," exhibited last year. In 1852 he was commissioned to paint eight pictures in oil for the corridor of the New House of Commons. Two o these "The Procession of Modern Art" and "The Last Sleep of Arthur" are already finished. Mr. Wyndham Cargill also to paint the "Installation of the Garter" in commemoration of the visit of Louis Napoleon), and "Queen Victoria at the Tomb of Napoleon." He is married to a lady of the same name as daughter of James Ward, the eldest living Academician herself an excellent artist. Mr. Ward received his diploma of A.R.A. in 1846, and that of R.A. in 1855.

WILLIAM POWELL FRITH, R.A.

Although genre painting is so much cultivated in England, no artist has become so familiar with the public than Mr Frith. Like most of the artists we have to notice, he was originally a landscape painter, and exhibited his first picture, which was not unfavourably received by the critics, at the Academy in 1840, when he was but nineteen years old. He exhibited but little at the Academy until 1845, in which year his works have been more progressive in merit, and his pencil more free and prosperity has followed, seeing he has scarcely yet reached the prime of life. Some excellent works followed, and in 1847, the "Village Pastor from the play of "Deserted Village" engraved by Holl, gained him his Associateship. In 1850 succeeded "The Return from Labour, and came from the Boccaccio Gentilhomme." Malvolio and Maria" displayed her husband at the dinner he gave the Belle Marque. In 1852 Mr Frith greatly extended his reputation by his "English Merry Making a Hundred Years Ago." This was followed by "An Old Woman accused of having Bewitched a Peasant Girl in the Presence of Lord Hopton" the most original works another scene from the Bourgeois Gentilhomme that in which M Jourdain requests the Marquise to take a little to enable him to accomplish the third bow which is wanting according to the instructions of his dancing master. "The Coming of Age" and "Charity Mr. Hills engraving). "Sancho Tells a Tale to prove Hunger is the Best Sauce at the Bottom of the Table," "Honeymood introduces the Bailiffs to Miss Richland as his Friends coming into the "Good-natured Man," &c. In 1852 Mr. Frith was elected R.A. Up to this time we find him, like Mr. Leslie, drawing his subjects from Shakspeare, Scott, Cervantes, Goldsmith, and Molière. In 1851 however, he exhibited a work in which he dealt, like Hogarth and Wilkie, most successfully with the actualities of contemporary life; we allude to his admirable "Life at the Sea-side—the most important picture was "Many Happy Returns of the Day" exhibited last year.

WILLIAM DYCE, R.A.

According to Dr. Waagen this able artist of the severe school is, by the excellence of his fresco painting eminently entitled to be the foundation of a monumental school of art in England. His early years were spent painting portraits in his native Scotland, and he was elected an Associate of the Scottish Academy in 1827. In 1811 his first sent a picture to the Royal Academy, but he has ever since been a very sparing contributor. The following year, indeed, almost the only works he has exhibited "The Descent of Venus," "Madonna and Child." "St. Dunstan Separating Edwy and Egiva," "Design for the Façade of a Chapel in the Style of Giotto's Scholars," and to illustrate the polychromatic execution of the end of the fourteenth century" (which indicated his knowledge of decorative art), Titian and Francesca da Sellemberg—in the Madonna and Child." Cenan Vanuccio." "The Meeting of Jacob and Rachel." "Lear in the Storm," "Joash Shooting the Arrow of Deliverance," and "Christabel." His critical and historical knowledge of art gained his appointment in 1844 to the Head-mastership of the School of Design, which had been just instituted at Somerset-house. His knowledge of the technicalities of art was, however, fully displayed by his acquaintance with the almost forgotten processes and manipulation of fresco-painting, and upon his return of the "Baptism of Ethelbert," in the House of Lords, his fame chiefly rests. In 1847 he was elected Associate of the Academy, and, in 1848 R.A.

JOHN PRESCOTT KNIGHT, R.A.

We regret that want of space prevents our transcribing a very amusing and characteristic autobiography of this eminent painter (of portraits chiefly), from the Art Journal of 1849. We may, however, here at least our facts from such an authentic source. Mr. Knight was born at Stafford in 1803. His father was the celebrated "Birth" Knight, the comedian. The theatrical taste of his father brought him to the London boards when a mere boy of our sketch was sufficiently old to be placed as a junior clerk with a West India merchant. The merchant's bankruptcy, however, soon released our embryo artist, and we cannot refrain from allowing Mr Knight to tell himself how the burst from his chrysalis state. "Out of these depressed I took to drawing, to the great amusement of the family, who all believed I can that way they were rather pleased to encourage my poor efforts. He went on in this state of things—lent on until my father was upon the point of leaving way, but one evening, being late alone, I determined upon making one effort more, and so, opening a large illustrated Bible, I made a copy from West's head of Elisha mocking my production on the sapper-table, went to bed and began to face the raillery of my merry judges. He announced on the next morning full of apprehension, that during his performance placed in a prominent part of the room, and received encouragement from his father, who was a practical lover of art. His encouragements were repeated, and he applied himself with renewed and immense energy to the study. His progress was enormous, and his pecuniary matters, though under George Clint. Mr. Knight's progress were however, suddenly clouded by the loss at once of "patron and resource" in the death of his father. Still he did not despair, but devoted himself to his art with the greatest difficulties, with undaunted self-reliance, and so successfully that his two first pictures, which were exhibited at the British Institution, were sold on the day of opening, and were very warmly praised by Stanfield, Collins, and many other eminent artists. Other pictures and portraits followed, by which, steadily increasing his reputation, he acquired his Associateship in 1836 and the higher honour of R.A. in 1844. Before he had been member of the Council the term of two years he was appointed secretary of the Royal Academy. Mr Knight's private have much of the higher qualities of portraiture, and are therefore even more appreciated by his brother artists than by the general public. They are faithful in resemblance, and full of character, and powerful in colour and impasto—and there is more than a touch of Sir Joshua in the handling that should put to the blush much of the flimsy spoon-meats of many of our fashionable portrait-painters.

FREDERICK GOODALL, A.R.A.

Mr. Edward Goodall, the eminent engraver, boasts a family of artists, among whom are his son, Frederick is the most distinguished. This son, the subject of our present notice was born in 1822, and as he says himself in his confessions never had any but his father as instructor. His father was also a painter. His mother was very early produced most promising fruit. When but seventeen he exhibited at the Academy a picture, the materials for which were supplied by a visit to Normandy. From the same sources, and also Brittany, North Wales, and Ireland, he subsequently collected fresh materials for several works which were very remarkable, considering the extreme youth of the artist. "The Fiery Furnace" now in the Vernon Gallery, was painted when he was only twenty. "The Village Festival (engraved in this journal in 1847, the year of its exhibition), was also purchased by Mr. Vernon and established his reputation. The works which succeeded were generally upon the bright side of human life. "The Wedding Morning," "Reading the Will," "The Gipsy Encampment," "The Village Doctor," "Home," "The Slipper," "The Postboy," "Rising the Maypole," "The Swing," and "Charles I. and his Family," all display extraordinary composition, tasteful in colour, charmingly natural, and carefully finished. In his "Cranmer at the Traitors' Gate," exhibited last year, he attempted the difficult task of concentrating the interest of a picture in the subtle expression of emotion in the faces, with what partial success to justify renewed efforts in this direction; although it had, from the critics of the hour, scarcely so much praise awarded it as was bestowed on his previous works. In 1852 he was elected A.R.A.

FREDERICK RICHARD PICKERSGILL, A.R.A.

The distinguished historical painter of the legitimate school (as born Frederick Richmond) was born in London, in 1820. He is a nephew of H. W. Pickersgill, R.A., the portrait-painter; and nephew, also, on the mother's side, to another R.A.—Witherington, the landscape-painter. In the competition at Westminster-hall, in 1844, his cartoon, "The Death of Lear," obtained one of the additional premiums of £100. Mr. Pickersgill confesses himself, however, to have been unsuccessful in the fresco process, as shown in Lear, specimen of the following year. In 1847 Mr. Pickersgill achieved the grand success of his life, the "Judas Iscariot-pleading the Burial of Harold." This great work, in the Westminster-hall competition obtained one of the three first-class premiums of £300. It is now placed in the New Houses of Parliament, the Commissioners having purchased it for a second sum of £500. This noble performance secured his election as A.R.A. in the same year. Mr Pickersgill has subsequently exhibited several pictures of cabinet size, with poetical subjects from Spenser, Shakspeare, Italian history, and other sources. But although sound judgment and good taste are displayed in the choice of the subjects of these works; their treatment characterised by delicacy of feeling and purity of expression; the colouring rich and brilliant; and the style orthodox and correct they still do not equal another very remarkable picture, in the "grand style," exhibited in 1851, "Samson Betrayed by Dalila." A scene from "Love's Labour's Lost," exhibited last year, had the questionable honour of some apparently-favourable criticism (at least, as nearly as could be judged from its peculiar ambiguity) at the hands of Mr Ruskin.

JOHN HENRY FOLEY, A.R.A.

Although sculpture is so little understood and appreciated in this country, we may still point to veteran sculptors of world-wide reputation, and to younger men like Mr. Foley who have only to be true to themselves to worthily supply their place. This artist was born in Dublin in 1818. When only thirteen, under the encouragement of his grandfather, a sculptor of that city, he commenced drawing and modelling. In 1834 he came to London, and henceforward devoted himself entirely to sculpture. He became a student of the Royal Academy the following year, and exhibited, for the first time, the "Death of Abel" and the model of "Innocence," in 1839. The next year, being only twenty-two, and having never visited Italy, Mr. Foley became at once famous by the model for his "Ino and the Infant Bacchus." It was executed in marble for the Earl of Ellesmere, and the symmetry and originality of its composition, its grace, sentiment, and beauty of form, render it not only by far the most remarkable sculpture in Bridgewater House, but one of the greatest achievements of English plastic art. The "Houseless Wanderer" was the next work from his chisel. In 1844 he produced his "Youth at a Stream," and exhibited it together with his "Ino and Bacchus" in the sculpture competition of that year in Westminster-hall. These gained him the commission for the statue of "Hampden," to form the companion to Mr. Bell's "Falkland," in St. Stephen's-hall, new Houses of Parliament. In has been well remarked, "these works display a true and spiritual portrait-character which stands to the costume; the motives and the execution of the details are in a correct plastic style." Mr. Foley was elected Associate in 1849, and with the exception of the "Egeria" erected in the Egyptian-hall at the Mansion-house, has these last few years allowed himself to be fully engaged on portrait-bust, monument, and repiche.

HENRY WEEKES, A.R.A.

This highly-esteemed sculptor was born at Canterbury, in 1807 As is almost always to be remarked in the history of successful artists the imitative faculty very early manifested itself, and Mr Weekes's father had the good sense to encourage the decided bias of his son. In 1822 the young neophyte in the temple of the arts was articled for five years to Behnes, and at the expiration of this period he at once engaged himself to Chantrey, with whom he remained for several years, eventually becoming his principal modeller. During this time Mr. Weekes did not neglect to exhibit some of his own works at the Academy. The death of Chantrey throwing the artist entirely on his own resources, instead of being prejudicial to the merit of his works, had its legitimate consequence in their increased originality. This being recognised by the Marquis of Wellesley, procured for Mr. Weekes the execution of the statue of that eminent statesman now in the East India House. Her Majesty also sat to him about this time for her bust. A series of commissions followed his success in Leadenhall-street for large and important statues and monuments for India. The chief works by which Mr. Weekes is known at home are the statues of Dr. Goodall, at Eton, and Lord Bacon, in Trinity College, Cambridge, and the monument to Shelley, erected at Christchurch, Hampshire. It may be said, however, that his reputation rests chiefly on the truth of character, and delicacy of expression of his portrait-busts. He is also particularly successful in posthumous works of this class. Not unfrequently Mr. Weekes exhibits ideal works of great sweetness and purity, and a "Shepherd" by him, in the Paris Exposition, was honourably mentioned. His Associateship was conferred upon him in 1852

AUGUSTUS LEOPOLD EGG, A.R.A.

This spiritual painter of tableaux de genre and semi-historical pictures was born in London, and first exhibited at the Academy in 1838. He has generally inclined to the humorous in his choice of subjects—such, for instance, as are affirmed by the lighter scenes of Shakspeare, and the humorous incidents recorded by the many authors of what have since been termed memoirs pour servir. Mr Egg's illustrations of Sir Walter Scott have been partly felicitous witness the clever colloquy in the second from "Lady Bellenden." The Victim in the Vernon Collection, and "Old Mortality Reading with Lamil" an exchange which proved the Old Bible in respect to gems, as the Duc de Lerme afterwards ironically says, "Ce n'est pas parlementaire, et surtout en famille." In 1848 Mr. Egg was elected A.R.A. In 1850 was exhibited the very remarkable picture, "Peter the Great Sees Catharine, his Future Empress, for the First Time." The Last Day and Death of Buckingham" (1853) proved in the striking antithesis of the "Death" (although historically incorrect) that is our "point a moral" as well as "adorn a tale." Here we may remark that the ethical influence of art is too often forgotten by artists, judging from the frivolous themes so generally chosen.

RICHARD JAMES LANE, A.R.A.

This distinguished engraver and unequalled lithographer was born with the century. Mr. Lane's family connections are interesting. He is the second son of the Rev. Dr. Lane, Prebendary of Hereford, who was a nephew of Gainsborough; and a younger brother is Mr. E. W. Lane, the well known Orientalist, author of "Modern Egyptians," and translator of the "Thousand and One Nights." The subject of our notice was made an articled pupil of Charles Heath, the line engraver, in 1816. The rapid diminution, in our time, of the encouragement given to line engraving, or the "high art" of the profession, and its having long been almost superseded by more rapid though less artistic methods of manipulation have had the same necessary effect upon the practice of Mr Lane as well as upon that of his confrères in the department of mezzotint engraving of Mr Cousins, the present head Academician. We are not surprised, therefore, that Mr. Lane should, after having in 1831, made a few essays in lithography so successfully that they presented him a rapid influx of commissions to allow himself to be entirely wanted to the walk of his profession in which there is, unhappily, far less remunerative liberty, than is to be gained. Mr. Lane's new success, however, which, being his own, do him much honour—was induced, with deep regret, and after a struggle of some six or eight years, to give away his engraving tools." When only twenty-seven he was elected to the title of Associate Engraver. Mr. Lane is also appointed lithographer to the Queen and Prince Albert.

JAMES CLARKE HOOK, A.R.A.

Most of our artists have a specialité, and few excel, like this painter, equally in landscape and figure subjects. Mr. Hook entered the schools of the Royal Academy at an early age, and gained, in 1843, two silver medals, and, in 1846, the gold medal for the best historical painting in oil. He began to exhibit as early as 1839; and in 1845 a work of his of much merit, "The Song of the Olden Time," appeared on the walls of the Academy. A series of pictures followed, treating—with a few exceptions, Venetian subjects, taken either directly from the history of Venice, or from poets who have invested with such deep interest her heroes, her cavaliers, her gondolas, palaces, and canals. Some scenes were, however, drawn from the artist's own imagination. All these works glowed with true Venetian splendour of colour; and their merit being of the kind to be recognised by the Academy, his rank of A.R.A. was conferred upon him in 1850. The picture entitled "Time of the Persecution of the Christian Reformers in Paris," one of Mr. Hook's best works appeared in 1854; and with it two pictures which not a little surprised the art-world by the total change in styles of subject they indicated and heralded. The somewhat conventional splendours of his Venetian pictures were, and have been since, entirely forgotten in the simplicity of Nature, and the homeliness of English landscape. Few, we think, will regret a change in an artist's practice which evinces very considerable power.

WILLIAM EDWARD FROST, A.R.A.

This refined painter of the semi-nude was born in 1810. When fifteen he was introduced by his father to Etty, the great colourist, who advised the course which the young student followed in his studies. Like most artists who have afterwards arrived at distinction, Mr. Frost commenced his career as a portrait-painter, and continued its practice for fourteen years. Before, however, finally forsaking this branch of his profession he gained the gold medal, given as a prize for the best historical painting at the Academy. In 1843 his cartoon of "Una Alarmed by Fauns" gained one of the third-class prizes for £100 given after the competition at Westminster-hall, and in the same year an Art-Union prizeholder selected his "Christ Crowned with Thorns" from the Exhibition of the Royal Academy. From this time portrait-painting was abandoned, and the series of pictures we commenced which have allied Mr. Frost's name with that of his brother-artist Egg—totype, Etty. Mr. Frost, however, inclines more to allegory, and, as a writer in the Art-Journal justly observes, "though less ambitious than Etty, appears as a great colourist, less lavish of his pigments, and less daring in their application, he is not less true to nature; while in drawing, in delicacy of feeling, in purity of feminine expression, and, we may add, in finish and modelling, "he is far superior." We enumerate a few of his more remarkable works in the order of their exhibition:—"A Bacchanalian Dance," "Nymphs Dancing," "Sabrina" (since engraved by the Art-Union), and "Diana and Actæon." The last secured his Associateship the same year, 1851. Then followed "Una and the Wood Nymphs" (purchased by her Majesty), "Euphrosyne," "Disarming of Cupid," "Wood Nymphs," "May Morning, and "Chastity" (1854).

TO CORRESPONDENTS

DEATH OF MR. STAUNTON.—We regret to announce that another temple has fallen! Another of our warriors has departed! Staunton was for twenty years has occupied a high place as a player of these Masters of Chess, and last made his last move in June 1838 when this eminent player paid his first visit to Paris and London with the gallant purpose of encountering those champions of real and British on their own soil he remained been a household word in Chess society. He may be acquired at this period with the contests with the great Frenchmen, with St. Amant and Bonconi, with Lewis, with Popert, Sloan, Walker, and other living men of London, was largely answered by the brilliant issue of the Match with Mr. Horwitz, which Staunton more visited this country, and though time had somewhat impaired his powers, he still victoriously in most of the combats in which he was engaged. Staunton's [illegible] were correspondent. Mr. Staunton being the armour upon the wall, and spite on rare occasions has been attempted to put him in rest; but to the last we are informed, he retained all his early love for the "princely exercise," and much of his early skill.

CHESS IN GERMANY
(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS*)*

The following game now pending between Alex. a-Chapelle and Elberfeld is not sent as a sample of profound Chess strategy, but merely as offering on the 16th move a position remarkable for interesting variations.

| BLACK | WHITE | BLACK | WHITE |
|---|---|---|---|
| Alex-la Chapelle | Elberfeld. | Alex. la Chapelle | Elberfeld. |
| 1. P to Q 4th | P to K 4th | 16. Q to K 6th | |
| 2. P to Q B 4th | P to K B 4th | It was here that I took the liberty of showing the Committee, in my variations, to prove that Elberfeld could (as they did) advantageously sacrifice a Kt. For example:— | |
| At this point of the game some members of the Alexander Committee requested me to see it, whereupon I laid before him a line of play as analysed by Mr Staunton in his "Handbook," which is as follows:— | | 16. | Kt takes K P |
| | | 17. P take s Kt | P to Q 6th (ch) |
| | | 18. K to his 2nd | Kt to B 7th (ch) |
| | | 19. K to Q sq | Kt takes Q Kt P (ch), and wins. |
| 1. P to Q 4th | P to K B 4th | | |
| 2. P to Q B 4th | P to K 3rd | Again— | |
| 3. P to Q Kt 3rd | P to Q Kt 3rd | 16. | Kt takes K P |
| 4. Q Kt to B 3rd | K B to K 2nd | 17. K to his 2nd | Kt takes K B P (ch) |
| 5. P to K B 3rd | P to Q 4th | 18. K takes R | Q takes Kt (ch) |
| 6. P takes P | P take s P | | |
| 7. Q B to K B 4th | Castles | And wins. | |
| | | Again— | |
| I paid game, | | 16. | K Kt takes K P |
| and strenuously recommended the move 1 P to Q 4th, but the Alexander amateurs declined it, on the ground that it was lost time, and only led to an even game. Upon this I left them alone in their glory. The game went apace: the old members were all security, the young ones full of fire and fun:— | | 17. Q takes K Kt | Kt to Q 6th (ch) |
| | | 18. K to his sq | Here a leading member of the Committee gravely proposed to move King to Q sq, to tempt White to take the K B P, but we intimated the probability of Elberfeld playing K Kt to K sq, &c. &c. |
| 3. P to K 3rd | P to Q Kt 3rd | 19. K to Q sq | R to K B 7th (ch) |
| 4. P to Q 4th | P to K B 4th | 20. K Kt to K B 3rd | Q R to K B sq |
| 5. Q B to Q 2nd | P to K 3rd | 21. K Kt to Q sq | Kt takes Q K P (ch) |
| 6. Q Kt to B 3rd | P to Q 4th | 22. K to Q B sq | Kt to Q B 6th |
| 7. Q to K 2nd | Castles | 23. Q to her 3rd | B K takes Kt, and wins. |
| 8. P to K R 4th | P to Q R 4th | | |
| 9. P takes K B P | P to Q Kt 5th | We will now proceed with the game as actually played — | |
| 10. P takes Q B P | Q Kt P takes P | 16. | K Kt takes K P |
| 11. P takes K P | Q B takes P | 17. Q takes Q Kt | B takes Q B 7th (ch) |
| 12. Q B P takes P | B takes P | 18. K to Q sq | Kt takes Q R |
| 13. B to Q B 4th | Q Kt to Q B 3rd | 19. K to Q B sq | Q R to Q Kt sq |
| 14. P to Q R 3rd | Q Kt to K 4th | 20. K to Q B sq | |
| 15. B takes B ch | K R takes B | And Elberfeld has to play. | |

Yours obediently, VOX.

P.S. I will send the terminating moves when the game is over.
